K-STATE STUDENTS TO PAY $98 FOR SEASON FOOTBALL TICKETS

On the heels of the failed stadium expansion referendum, student season ticket prices for football games have been increased from $10 to $14 per game. It is the second price increase for student tickets in the '90s, but officials say it has nothing to do with the student vote against a privilege fee for expansion.

JOHN STOUS
Kansas State Collegian

Student season tickets for next season's K-State home football games have gone from $10 to $14 per game, and a new season ticket package has been offered to the general public.

"Basically, the overall cost of business is going up, and we have to generate our own income," said Bob Cavello, director of business services for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

Max Urick, director of intercollegiate athletics, said the department planned on increasing the student ticket prices because of the increasing cost of running a business, even before Student Senate cut $147,215 of privilege fee money early this year. However, he said the increased ticket prices will help cover the loss of privilege fee money.

The increase in the student ticket prices is the second price hike of the 1990s. The first came in 1995 when the price increased from $7 to $10 per game.

CAVELLO

The student tickets are the only tickets experiencing an increase this year. The general public tickets increased $5 a game last year, and the student price remained $10.

Next fall's student season football tickets will be $98. Public season football tickets are $197. All prices are up because the Wildcats' schedule includes seven home games this year compared to six home games played last year.

Cavello said reasons for the increase in operating a business include traveling expenses, equipment, scholarship increases and meeting the federal mandate for Title IX on gender equality.

He also said individual student tickets cost more than the punch tickets sold last year — which causes an increase in the overall prices.

Urick said the temporary bleachers that are brought into the stadium to handle the demand for tickets also increases the general costs of running the program.

Urick and Cavello said students should not think the price increase is punitive for voting down a referendum in the fall that would have had the students help pay for the stadium expansion that will begin after the 1998 season.

"Whether the referendum passed or failed, the ticket prices were going to go up," Cavello said. "I can't stress enough that the increase is not a punishment for the students' decision not to support the stadium expansion. They understand the need to increase price as the cost of business increases."

Kent Brown, sports information director, said K-State tries to keep the student ticket prices at less than half the cost of the general public's.

"The tickets are still about 50 percent below the regular tickets," he said. "We also are com-

Mann steps into office of president

Even after years in K-State student government, Patrick Carney and Aaron Otto had a new experience at Thursday's Student Senate meeting.

They navigated the Senate floor with walkers.

After the annual award banquet, senators had the last meeting of this term in the Big 12 Room of the K-State Student Union. They passed several pieces of legislation and watched Carney and Otto use the fruits of the lifetime achievement awards they were given earlier in the evening.

Governmental Relations Chair Carney and Privilege Fee Chair Otto, along with Agriculture Sen. Bret Glendening and Veterinary Medicine Sen. Aaron Truax, also were commended for their years of service to the body and were allowed to pound the Senate gavel.

CARNEY

Carney said his memories of student government were both good and bad.

"When they wrote the words, 'It's been the best of times. It's been the worst of times,' I think they can truly be encompassed in this room," he said.

After the 1997-98 Senate adjourned, Senate Chair Jeff Dougan swore into office the 1998-99 senators, Student Body President Tracey Mann and Student Body Vice President Andy Macklin.

In its final minutes, the 1997-98 Senate passed several commendations, including one written by Phil Anderson and Bill Muir, faculty representatives to Senate, commending senators for their work this term.

OTTO

Before he was sworn in, Mann, who served as Senate vice chair during the 1997-1998 Senate term, commended Dougan for his work.

"They say that character is who you are when the lights are off, the crowd is not there and you are by yourself," Mann said. "I can't tell you how many times I go into the SGA office at midnight or 1 a.m. and most of the lights are off, but there's Jeff Dougan, working for you."

Paperwork, delays place Colbert course in rough

JON KURCHE
Kansas State Collegian

Making progress on the Colbert Hills Golf Course has not been an easy task for Bob Krause, vice president for institutional advancement and the man who has helped organize the effort to build a golf course for K-State.

"It takes so long to get everything lined up and begin to do some planning for the next phase. It's a mountain of paper," Krause said.

Colbert Hills, named after K-State alumnus and PGA Senior Tour player Jim Colbert, will become the home course for the K-State men's and women's golf teams. It will include an 18-hole championship golf course, club house, driving range, nine-hole par-three teaching and training areas, and practice areas. It will be the first PGA Tour-managed college course.

Construction should begin soon, Krause said.

"We're in the process. Hopefully, bonds will be closed by the end of this month. Construction should start in May, and we should be right on schedule for a 1999 opening," said Krause, who helped the 1,000 acres of land on which the course will rest gain property-tax-exemption status in April 1997. Torch lighting, parade signal official start as All-University Open House begins today

SHERYL WILLIAMS
Kansas State Collegian

The College of Engineering will kick off its two-day All-University Open House activities at noon today with a parade and the lighting of the 76th annual Engineering Open House torch. The parade will originate between King and Willard halls, with the Union Courtyard as its final destination.

Students from each department will compete with one another by presenting skits, along with their floats, in the Courtyard.

"The students are competing for the 'Yellow Brick' award, and that's the highlight," said Ray Hightower, assistant dean of the College of Engineering. "This is a fun thing, the rest of the open house is very serious, with their displays. They're very professional."

Relay runners will arrive following the award ceremony to light the torch. The relay, which is not a race, will begin at K-Hill, across the Kansas River viaduct. Back in the '20s, before there was an "S" on the hill, the runners ran from Seaton Hall to K-Hill and lit torches to light up the "K" for the weekend. Hightower said it is rumored that Dean Terry King will participate in the run.

The Collegian has open house covered in its special section in today's paper. See Pages 15-24.

Crowning of St. Pat and St. Patricia also will take place in the Courtyard. Students voted on three engineering women and three engineering men candidates on Monday and Tuesday. The winners will be announced after the parade.

There will be an Engineering Awareness seminar today from 2 to 4 p.m. for prospective students. Open house display tours will run today from 5:30 to 9 p.m. and Saturday from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. in Seaton, Durland, Rathbone and Ward halls.

Highlights of the displays include a solar car and a Baja car that were in national competitions and a computer science robot that won an international competition last year.

The Manufacturing Learning Center, 510 McCall Road, also will participate in the open house with tours of the facility from 9 a.m. to 2 p.m. There will be demonstrations of equipment, including a laser cutter and a robotic welder.

The Kansas Testing Lab for Civil Infrastructure and Highway Research also will be open for touring from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. It is located at 925 Carlson, south of the Manufacturing Learning Center.

Ten Air Force ROTC cadets traveled with the University of Kansas AFROTC to Nellis Air Force Base, outside Las Vegas, during spring break.

"We have a great working relationship with KU that enables us to offer these kinds of trips to our cadets. It is not a requirement, but an extra incentive that is offered to them if they want to learn more," Maj. Steve Dorfman, K-State's commandant of cadets, said.

The cadets went to have fun but also to have a new experience.

Kathy Hetland, freshman in math, said she thought the best part was getting to see all the airplanes and being able to sit in some of them.

The cadets took a tour of the base, saw Las Vegas and learned about the different jobs on a base.

"It is hard to see what life on a base is really like. This trip was to learn more about the different jobs and what they do. Then you can see what you want to do," Hetland said.

They also saw some of the lessons and principles they hear about every day in action.

"When we would go somewhere, and more than one person would be talking, it made me realize how important teamwork is and how much everyone works together. One person does a job, but they have to depend on someone else. I saw how important teamwork is in the Air Force," Hetland said.

Development group places master plan on hold, says more discussion needed

The Campus Development Committee moved to table a motion to approve the new master plan at its meeting Thursday.

Citing more discussion and editing as reasons to hold off on approval, the committee made it evident a vote for approval would be taken at the next meeting at 2 p.m. May 7 at the facilities planning office conference room in Dykstra Hall.

Committee members agreed that more time is needed to review comments made by audience members at the March 19 forum the committee sponsored.

In other business, Larry Garvin, a former university architect who now teaches in the College of Architecture, Planning and Design, presented a history of campus development. He also took time to encourage committee members to look for the best possible campus plan.

"In your own discussion of planning I hope you take into consideration the campus's facilities constitute an opportunity to reinforce the efforts of faculty and students by creating a quality environment for academic exercise," Garvin said.

Ottawa University student elected mayor of town after serving as commissioner

OTTAWA — At age 20, Blaine Finch could vote to approve liquor licenses, but he wasn't old enough by law to drink alcohol.

After serving one year as a city commissioner, the now 21-year-old college student has been elected mayor of Ottawa, an eastern Kansas town of about 11,500 people.

"He's either the youngest mayor in the history of Kansas or close to it," said Don Moler, general counsel of the state's league of municipalities. "To my knowledge there's no record kept of that, but it's possible he's the youngest."

The Ottawa native is by far the youngest mayor ever in Ottawa. The previous youngest mayor was Fred Zook who was 34 when he took office in 1978, Scott Bird, Ottawa city clerk, said.

Finch was the top vote-getter in last year's commission election. He was selected mayor by a 4-0 vote of the commissioners Wednesday night.

The tradition in Ottawa is the commissioner with the most votes in the previous election serves as mayor pro tem and is next in line for the mayor's post, Commissioner Gene Ramsey said.

"He's worked hard in college and has a year on the commission," Ramsey said. "Blaine is highly intelligent and is dedicated to doing a good job."

Finch is a senior at Ottawa University majoring in history, political science and education. He also works as a legislative intern for state Rep. Ralph Tanner, R-Baldwin.

Finch plans either to stay in politics or pursue a career in education after he graduates from college. He said the public has been supportive of his election despite his age.

"I served as mayor pro tem last year and the people had a year to see that I have learned the job," Finch said. "I'm not coming in cold."

McVeigh seeks closed-circuit broadcast of his appeal proceedings from prison

DENVER — Convicted bomber Timothy McVeigh, confined to the "Super Max" prison in southern Colorado, said he wants the federal government to provide him with a closed-circuit telecast of his appeals hearing if the government allows victims the same privilege.

McVeigh said it would be unfair for victims to watch the hearing if he is denied the same right.

Victims have petitioned the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, asking that a new federal law requiring that victims be allowed to watch the proceedings on closed-circuit television in Oklahoma be extended to the appeals.

Under current procedures, appeals are not televised, and defendants are not allowed to be present.

McVeigh said if the court decides to televise the proceedings, it also should make exceptions for him.

"To assure impartiality and the appearance of impartiality, the extraordinary courtesy extended to the victims and survivors should also be extended to Mr. McVeigh.

The closed-circuit broadcast should not only be transmitted to Oklahoma City, but also to the facility where Mr. McVeigh is incarcerated," McVeigh said in a motion filed Wednesday.

The government attorneys have asked the 10th Circuit Court of Appeals to allow the broadcast for bombing survivors and victims' relatives who cannot attend the hearing.

The trials of McVeigh and Terry Nichols were broadcast in that fashion under a federal law passed by Congress at the request of bombing victims. Those who were allowed to attend were carefully screened.

The 10th Circuit set oral arguments on McVeigh's appeal for April 28.

The decorated war veteran was convicted last year of murder, conspiracy and weapons-related counts in the April 19, 1995, bombing that killed 168 and injured more than 500.

He appealed his conviction and death sentence and is being held in the maximum security federal prison in Florence, Colo.

House votes 411-8 to provide wider berth for credit unions in their battle with banks

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The House voted overwhelmingly Wednesday to override the Supreme Court and allow credit unions to keep casting a wider net for customers in competition with banks.

The banking industry had been pressing for restrictions on who can join credit unions.

By a 411-8 vote, the House passed the bipartisan bill, which would supersede a recent high court ruling that had been sought by the banking industry. Under the measure federal credit unions could continue to include more than one group in their memberships, within certain limits.

All current credit union customers would be allowed to keep their accounts. The Supreme Court decision in February restricting the credit unions' customer base had provoked worry among the 20 million or so current members who were made ineligible because they are outside a credit union's immediate group.

Although the Senate hasn't yet acted on a similar bill, the House action likely will generate momentum there for the legislation, which also is supported by the Clinton administration.

"We are ready in position for victory in the Senate," said Daniel Mica, president and chief executive officer of the Credit Union National Association. "This really is a life-or-death issue for credit unions."

Ceremony of flags to begin festivities in observance of International Week

MIKE BURGESS
Kansas State Collegian

Students have the opportunity to take a trip around the world without leaving campus with the events of International Week.

Festivities for International Week kick off Monday with a parade of flags starting at 11:45 a.m. from the International Student Center. The group will walk to the Union Courtyard and plans to arrive there around noon, when the ceremony begins. There will be a flag for each of the 94 nations represented at K-State by the about-900 international students.

Jim Endrizzi, director of programs for the International Student Center, said this is a chance for international students to showcase their cultures.

"We kick off the week with a flag parade through campus. We bring our flag collection through campus, and then they are going to have the flags set up all week in the Union Courtyard," he said.

The opening ceremony will begin with the parade and follow with speakers. The week also include activities, such as the showing of international movies with English subtitles, African drumming and a children's fashion show, in addition to a variety of other performances and speakers. The week concludes with International Night, which includes a catered dinner and a cultural show at McCain Auditorium.

Manuri Nakkawita, senior in advertising and International Coordinating Council president, said International Night will be the highlight of the week and students can see a variety of performances there.

"They can sit back and relax, and it is pretty much like taking a trip around the world," she said. "We have performances all the way from Zaire to Thailand.

"We are giving all of the international students on campus a chance to showcase their culture and talents for the rest of the university," she said.

Endrizzi said with 94 different countries represented, K-State has one of the most varied international populations around, and International Week is a unique opportunity to experience the variety of cultures in a friendly environment.

"No other place includes such a diverse group of people together, and no one even thinks twice about it either," he said.

International Week is organized by ICC, which is made up of representatives from the international groups on campus.

Endrizzi said he estimated ICC will spend between $2,500 and $3,000 for the week. He said it receives Student Government Association funding and hopes that all students will consider participating, because they help pay for it.

In addition to International Week, there are other international events happening in April. ICC is calling it International Month, and the groups have the opportunity to have events on their own days.

Nausheen Kazi, senior in hotel restaurant management and co-vice president of ICC, said, "I think that it is better to call it International Month because everyone is having their night during this month."

She said they want to give other people a feel for what their cultures have to offer.

"We are curious people and experience American culture," she said. "We just want other people to have a taste of our cultures."

Widow of slain civil rights leader wants to form commission to look in to death

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATLANTA — The Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.'s widow called for a national commission to investigate her husband's assassination Thursday, two days before the 30th anniversary of his slaying.

Coretta Scott King called for a meeting with President Clinton to discuss possible new evidence and recent developments in the case and to ask him to initiate a new investigation.

Coretta Scott King said she would like to see an investigative commission with the authority to provide immunity and protection for people who come forward to tell what they know about Martin Luther King Jr.'s death.

"My family and I are still appealing for justice," Coretta Scott King said outside her husband's crypt at the Martin Luther King Jr. Center for Nonviolent Social Change.

The family has pushed unsuccessfully for a trial for James Earl Ray, who confessed to the killing in 1969 but later recanted.

"I am very clear that it is morally wrong to make Mr. Ray the scapegoat when he has never had a trial, and there is mounting evidence that others were involved," Coretta Scott King said.

Coretta Scott King was joined by her sons, Dexter and Martin III, and former U.N. Ambassador Andrew Young, who accused authorities of being reluctant to test the rifle Ray allegedly used to kill Martin Luther King Jr. and for failing to interview people who claim to have information pointing to a conspiracy.

"Those questions have not been faced by the people who want to close this investigation," said Young, a former Atlanta mayor and Martin Luther King Jr. lieutenant during the 1960s.

Last year, Dexter King visited Ray, who is serving a 99-year sentence, and said he no longer believed Ray killed his father.

Courts repeatedly have upheld Ray's guilty plea. Just last week, the district attorney in Memphis, Tenn., said a reinvestigation of the Martin Luther King Jr. slaying still found no credible evidence that anyone other than Ray committed the crime.

Young said he would like to discuss with Clinton the formation of a commission similar to the truth and reconciliation commission investigating apartheid-era abuses in South Africa.

"Nobody is interested in retribution," Young told The Atlanta Journal-Constitution on Wednesday. "Not even justice. We are interested in extending the mercy of the family and the (civil rights) movement to people like James Earl Ray, who, regardless of his role, was an innocent victim of the racism and what was going on at the time.

"We encourage others to come forward and tell the truth. And we want the government to facilitate this."

Saturday is the 30th anniversary of the killing in Memphis where a march and rally are planned as well as a moment of silence and prayer.

Open house offers opportunities for all K-Staters

The All-University Open House this weekend isn't just one of the best opportunities K-State has to show off bright students, innovative research and award-winning departments.

It's also a great time for K-State students, present and future, to get to know the university better and realize all the cool things this campus has to offer.

Saturday is clearly important as 2,500 students and faculty have volunteered their time to organize the open-house activities.

The open house has three main goals. First, it's a recruiting tool. High school and transfer students interested in K-State should be bold. Look around and get to know the campus. Meet with the many K-State students available in each department and ask tough questions.

This is a great time to become familiar with campus and make connections. Find out graduation rates, beginning salaries and job options for the curricula that are most appealing. Discuss average class sizes, possible living options and organizations complimenting your academic program. In other words, make yourself at home. Make sure you understand how much is available here.

The second goal of open house is to get community members involved and open up many research opportunities. This is home for most of your time in college so look at the recreation and entertainment options available in Manhattan.

The third goal of open house is to offer K-Staters a chance to learn more about this university. Each school will have events and the K-State Student Union will be filled with exhibits designed to be accessible and educational.

K-Staters volunteer time and energy to make the open house a success, but those who have helped in the past understand how much fun the events and exhibits can be. There are always opportunities to learn how to become more involved on campus.

Students, past and present, should use Saturday to become explorers. Whether experiencing K-State for the first time or as a graduating senior, there is much to learn about this campus.

WALK THE WALK IF YOU ARE GOING TO TALK THE TALK

Follow Jesus Christ's example and let love show through your actions

Last week, I had the privilege of spending time with some remarkable people who are striving to make this world a better place to live — one person at a time. (And they live in Washington, D.C., — imagine that.) I gained wisdom from the stories they told, the lives they have lived and the moments they created.

I want to say thanks to Bill, David, Ryan, Aaron, Brandon, Tracey, Robben, Jason, Toby, Phil and Jeff. These 11 K-State guys fulfilled the meaning of friendship. And a special thanks to our friends at Ivenwald and Cedar Point for having us.

My group got to spend one evening with Bernard and Ruth Dudley. They are a fascinating couple who have lived through much of the turmoil that has taken place in South Africa. They live in Washington, D.C., where they will stay until their return home to Capetown, South Africa.

The 12 of us sat in the Dudleys' living room and were served freshly baked cherry cobbler topped with vanilla ice cream. This was ruly a delightful evening. During our discussions, Bernard told us a story about his first visit to Kansas. Many years ago one man in Kansas City handed him one of life's truths that he remembers to this day. The moral was simple. But the effect was forever multiplying.

The person that influenced him was not a politician, or an eloquent public speaker, but rather an ordinary shoe shiner. While polishing Bernard's shoes, this man explained to Bernard that his job was not shining shoes. It was sharing the love of Jesus to everyone who sat in his chair. If that meant listening, then he listened. If that meant giving advice, then he would give advice. And if that meant telling them how much God loved them, then that is what he did.

The shoe shiner pointed to a young man standing nearby. He said the man was not only shining shoes for God, but he was also training other young men to shine shoes for Jesus. The lifelong lesson that remains with Bernard is this: Work with what you have and help others to do the same.

This advice is parallel to the advice Mother Teresa gave Rep. Tony Hall. Tony spent part of his Sunday afternoon giving our group advice. He told us stories about his visit to India where he was able to visit Mother Teresa. While talking with her, Tony asked her how he himself could better serve people. She walked over to a little child, picked him up and held him. She looked back at Tony and told him to do the work that was in front of him.

Worlds apart, yet both the shoe shiner and Mother Teresa influenced the world for Jesus by loving the people in front of them.

There was another particular spring break event that has eternally left its mark on me. It occurred Tuesday night. I was sitting on a living room floor surrounded by more than 40 other people who were gathered for a meeting. Some were college students, others were aged.

Because I have always been fascinated by elderly people, my eyes wandered to such a couple sitting across the room. On the couch sat the woman. Her right arm rested on the arm of the couch. Her other hand rested in her lap. Her back was slightly bent, and she wore a simple dress with pale colors. To her right sat her husband. His gray hair and wrinkled face also told of his age.

Near the end of the meeting, the woman started to fall asleep. Her eyes drooped and she finally nodded off. At that moment, the man did a simple act that told more of his love for his wife than words could ever have described. As her eyes closed, the man reached over with his left hand and slid it onto hers. She opened her eyes and looked into his. With a wink, he smiled back.

The words were unnecessary. "I love you" was spoken clearer than the lips could have uttered.

His touch spoke clearly of the love and compassion he had for his bride of more than 50 years. After that eternal glance, I watched as the woman turned her wedding ring on her finger. God only knows the love that they shared for one another.

I hope that I will someday experience a love as deep as that.

I wish there was a way to relate everything that I experienced. But rather than submit a 50-page column, I have decided to condense. Here is my summarized spring-break wisdom: Love Jesus passionately. Love the people who are in front of you in the same way Christ did. Don't wait until tomorrow to act upon that which you know to be right.

Every person, every day, needs love. And finally, all it takes is a willing heart to serve the person in front of you.

K-State's legacy shows on campus, in students

VIEWPOINT

KEN WELLS

Ken is a senior in computer science. You can send e-mail to Ken at sigma7@ksu.edu.

Welcome to K-State. You've stumbled upon the best-kept academic secret in our nation's midsection. You've undoubtedly heard of our football team. You've probably heard about our basketball team (sigh), and there's plenty of other reasons to cheer on K-State athletics.

Chances are, though, you're not as familiar with K-State's academic legacy, but that's nothing to be ashamed of. It's enough of a secret that many students here still don't realize the tradition they're standing upon.

You're going to meet a variety of personalities at K-State, and odds are you'll run into a man named Jon Wefald. He's a lot of things, including a sports fan, dog owner and president of the university. Maybe you've been steeled against the monolithic, heartless ghoul of an administrative president, and thus Wefald should be a pleasant shock to the system. He's helmed this university for more than a decade and hasn't lost touch with the students who attend it. Don't think about inviting him over to watch a basketball game without immediately picking up your place; he just might be knocking on your door with a bag of chips and a jar of salsa.

During his tenure, Wefald has fostered one of the strongest academic programs in the nation. K-State ranks second among state schools and is tied for 12th among all universities in its number of Rhodes scholars since Wefald's arrival in 1986. Additionally, since the inauguration of the Goldwater Scholarship program in 1989, K-State ranks behind only Princeton and is tied with Harvard in its number of Goldwater scholars. Only Texas A&M rivals K-State's record in the Big 12 in fielding members of the USA Today All-USA College Academic Teams. K-State's student body has swelled above the 20,000 mark. These are trends of excellence that show no sign of relenting.

With Wefald providing impressive leadership from his position, it's easy to miss K-State's individual departments and their individual excellence. You might have heard of the formidable speech and debate teams, which have won several national championships in recent years, or perhaps the livestock judging team, which tallied its fourth consecutive national championship this fall. Impressive pedigree, isn't it?

And you can carry the torch.

One of the most impressive qualities about this university has been its openness and willingness to embrace new, fresh faces. These are the faces of people not long divorced from their youthful days of inexperience and vulnerability, and they know what it's like to be lost. The transition from rookie to grizzled veteran happens with the blink of a flashbulb, and the memories of an outsider are replaced with confidence and the awareness that you've become part of a greater whole and a proud tradition.

There are many other reasons why I enjoy this campus. Whether in the simple pleasures like the aesthetic beauty of Nichols Hall's neo-medieval structure or the casual atmosphere of the recreation area in the basement of the K-State Student Union, there's a sense of community. From the placid but concentrated silence of the sparkling new Hale Library to the commotion of the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, there's fascinating diversity all compacted into a surprisingly cozy space. All of your basic needs are within strolling distance on a perfectly navigable university space.

Surrounding the campus almost protectively is the city of Manhattan, a community that realizes the intrinsic nature of students to its livelihood. If you're anticipating friction between the residents and the students, better pull up a chair. Coexistence is the watchword, and harmony is oddly inescapable. Manhattan and K-State complement each other in the best kind of symbiotic relationship.

There are many other smaller details, from the manic squirrels bouncing from tree to tree to student (well, they're excited), to the stoic calm of professors genuinely willing to assist students along their academic journeys. Relax in the city park on a lazy spring day or take a short trip to Tuttle Creek. Jaunt through Aggieville, where a bizarre calvacade of capitalistic needs are met within a stone's throw of each other.

Overall, realize that as a student of K-State, the campus exists to facilitate to your needs. Partake of it and enjoy. Join the 20,000 others who have come to call this place home.

You won't regret it.

SOCIETY GOING SOUTH

Viewers might not want to admit it, but a popular cartoon accurately displays a world many try desperately to hide

VIEWPOINT

SCOTT HOPPER

Scott is a junior in psychology. You can send e-mail to Scott at hoppa@ksu.edu.

Like cocaine, tapes are smuggled via the cartoon cartel into homes across the Midwest and elsewhere. This ring will be expanding to Europe in a month, which has many cable empires in an uproar. What is this craze sweeping the world and hooking many unsuspecting teenagers or twenty-somethings to the boob tube?

It's a half-hour cartoon set in the fictitious town of South Park, Colo. Four nine-year-olds depict shocking American reality and relate racism, bigotry and sexism surprisingly well to their viewing audience. Throwing political correctness into the wind, these cartoon children flagrantly defy censorship of speech and behave in ways that make the viewer feel bad at enjoying it. Somewhere inside, the viewer knows the jokes shouldn't be funny, but they still find themselves laughing.

The cartoon's stars are Kyle, Cartman, Stan and Kenny. In one episode, Cartman, an overweight lover of Cheesy Poofs, dresses as Adolf Hitler for Halloween. After watching a TV documentary explaining why Hitler was bad, it only works to redouble his belief that Hitler was cool. Kyle, a Jew, catches continuous abuse and ridicule for his beliefs. Chef, a sex-crazed smoothie,, launches into songs about women while he serves food in the cafeteria.

Will this show ever appear on basic cable in Manhattan? Probably not. Will a TV sitcom based on these cartoon personalities ever be created? Probably not.

Why? It is too real. Americans have difficulty facing some of these realities. In real life, people are bigots, racists and sexists. People abuse each other. Wars are based on the topics addressed in this underground cartoon parody.

Why has this show not been banned? It's tough to be offended by the words of a nine-year-old. Although the jokes might give most NAACP activists heart failure, the cartoon's stars are able to hide behind their elementary school naiveté. These topics are only stomachable if they are depicted in a cartoon. A sitcom with real-life actors behaving in the same manner would spark riots in most large cities.

The cartoon's comedy comes from the shocking nature of the topics.

There are some things in America that are taboo to talk about in public. South Park jumps head first into these areas with blatant disregard for moral justice, but it's still funny.

Will South Park be as popular as it is in America over in Europe next month? Possibly not.

The TV market in Europe is saturated with America-shocking sitcoms. Their commercials alone would stun censors in America. This is not to say that South Park won't be popular in Europe, but the cartoon feeds upon its shock value for ratings.

In short, Europeans won't feel as subversively amused as Americans in viewing such a comedy. Their sitcoms portray reality already.

In America these days, the only way you get to depict three dimensions is in two.

Court translators OK, but not bilingual ballot

Editor,

It is readily apparent that emotions dominate the letter by Javier Carrillo ("Propositions 187, 209 skew bilingualism") in the April 1 edition of the Collegian. Carrillo gives the reader the impression that advocates for English as the primary language are out to eliminate any and all traces of languages other than English. This is false. As with any organization (your choice), there are always elements contained within which are radical in nature and do not reflect that organization or movement as a whole. These fringe elements are what are usually used as an indication of the intentions of the whole organization by opponents and the uninformed.

Carrillo appears to be a supporter of bilingualism as a means of official communication. His "basic survival rights" included "...court translators and ballot information." I would argue that services such as court translators are not only necessary but should be required. Anyone visiting this country should be able to have assistance for preservation of their rights.

His reference to ballot information as needing to be bilingual is another matter. This reference by Carrillo is a gross injustice to the individual needing this aid. Having the ability to vote is an indication that the individual is a citizen of our country. As society becomes increasingly complex, so do the issues which are brought before the people to be debated and voted upon. The gross injustice Carrillo is imposing upon individuals who require a translation to cast their ballot is this: How can that individual make an informed opinion with minimal information?

Put yourself in that individual's position by imagining your favorite book, but the only information you are able to receive from the book is what is written on the jacket and what others tell you.

The prose contained within the book is unable to touch you, unable to impart specific emotions and thoughts if it is not personally read. Because this is the case, how can individuals formulate their own opinions upon issues in our society if they are not able to comprehend the English language?

The United States has all the problems that face any large, diverse, industrialized country. Eliminating these problems requires intelligent individuals making intelligent and informed decisions. Life cannot be dealt with in a "Cliff's notes" manner. Neither can the issues of this country. I, for one, would prefer to read the book.

DB92 manager blasts coverage of forum

Editor,

As general manager of the campus radio station, KSDB- FM 91.9, I would like to offer the following response to the article printed in the Wednesday issue of the Collegian.

The headline was most inappropriate because the diversity forum did not spur a walk-out of any type. Several students went to rear of the auditorium and conferred among themselves before returning to the discussion. During their absence, many issues were addressed by panelists. The controversy seems to stem from an example presented by the moderator from a situation that occurred in 1992. Note that the replies by Cliff Conrad, a Hale Library staff member, infer as though this is a current policy.

Contrary to the remarks of Conrad, DB92 is perhaps the most diverse environment at K-State. People who are not familiar with DB92 understand, recognize and respect DB92 for its accomplishments in the areas of multicultural diversity and diversity in its programming.

DB92 has the most diverse programming schedule of any radio station in the nation. Our staff consists of women and people of many different races and national origins. We are a volunteer staff. To correct the paraphrase in the article, I stated, "It is difficult to get people to work at DB92 primarily because we are volunteer."

The discussion for which I volunteered my time was focused upon diversity in the media. For some reason, a select group of students chose to harp on an event which occurred in 1992 during which everyone presently at DB92 was not involved.

It's not that difficult to tune in to DB92 and listen to the diverse programming and to recognize the dedication our staff has for this radio station. I can only hope that people like Conrad would refrain from pushing their personal agendas and take a good look around at their environment here at K-State.

Media outlets that are doing positive things to increase diversity at K-State deserve support, rather than unfounded criticism that has no bearing on today's policies.

It is quite obvious Conrad knows nothing about DB92 and perhaps even less about diversity issues. Get informed or get involved. Either way, a wake-up call is warranted.

Additionally, the article itself should have focused on the diversity forum. Many topics were discussed during the two-hour forum and the last of importance was the 15 minutes of venting by the students with regard to the the 1992 example.

I hope in the future, the Collegian will review its articles for factual clarity prior to printing, especially when the commentary by one student has no bearing on present-day practices at KSDB can result in a negative view of a positive organization. At DB92, we are offended by the headlines used with the article.

Station boasts diversity

Editor,

My name is Locy Smith II. I'm the underwriting director (advertising sales director) for KSDB-FM 91.9 and a black male. I'm writing in response to the article that appeared in Wednesday's Collegian. If Conrad has ever listened to DB92, he would know that we offer the most diverse programming in the area. DB92 plays everything from jazz in the morning to hip-hop at night. However, diversity isn't about the programming that DB92 plays, it's about the people that work at the radio station.

DB92 has the only minority on staff for the entire school of journalism. DB92 even has minorities in head staff positions. We have a web page at DB92.com where anyone can see our executive staff. The DB92 executive staff is full of women and minorities. But DB92 also has more minorities working on staff than the Collegian or Royal Purple.

As far as sales go, "Jam the Box" and sports are the most popular programs hands down. As the underwriting director, I'm in constant contact with DB92 clients and students. If DB92 is so concerned with money, why do we continue to offer the other formats? Or for that matter, why does DB92 have so many minorities on its staff?

Penders resigns from Texas job

AUSTIN, Texas — Tom Penders, the winningest basketball coach in University of Texas history but the target of a player revolt, resigned Thursday.

PENDERS

"It is with mixed emotions that I resign," Penders said during a news conference.

"I dedicated the last 10 years of my life to bringing the university a basketball program that everyone could be proud of," he said.

Penders, 52, who had four years remaining on his contract at $550,000 per year, will be paid $643,000 from the university as a settlement.

The settlement also includes an agreement that neither Penders nor the school will take legal action against the other.

Penders' assistants will be paid through the end of their contracts in August.

The outgoing coach, who had a defibrillator and pacemaker implanted in his chest to monitor an enlarged heart at the beginning of the season, said he hasn't yet decided what to do next.

"It is the time in my life to pursue other options," Penders said, adding that he is considering radio and TV jobs and possibly coaching again.

The news conference announcing Penders' resignation had an almost surreal feel to it.

Penders and Texas athletic director DeLoss Dodds hadn't spoken for nearly three weeks in the wake of four players going to Dodds' home on March 8 to say they had lost faith in Penders and his program.

Yet on Thursday, Penders and Dodds were sitting side by side, praising each other and patting each other on the back.

Junior co-captain Kris Clack, a Penders supporter who repeatedly has said Penders' departure would send a signal that players could run off a coach, shook his head in disbelief.

"I just heard everything, and I don't have any answers right now," Clack said. "Everybody has questions and doubts about all this."

Penders' resignation came 3 1/2 weeks after freshmen Luke Axtell, Chris Mihm and Bernard Smith, as well as sophomore Gabe Muoneke — all starters and cornerstones of the team — met with Dodds and complained about the program.

Dodds said it would be wrong to assume a player revolt drove the coach out.

"I think that's absolutely false," he said. "This is not a players issue. This is Tom making a decision about his career."

Penders echoed that sentiment, saying, "I don't want turmoil. This is about me wanting to make a change. I don't have any animosity toward anyone."

BASEBALL ROUNDUP
Kansas City loses 3-run lead in ninth, fall to Baltimore 4-3

BALTIMORE — This probably wouldn't have happened last season.

The Baltimore Orioles won 98 games last year, but few in the fashion in which they beat the Kansas City Royals on Thursday night.

Jeffrey Hammonds' two-run single in the bottom of the ninth inning capped a four-run uprising that gave the Orioles an uplifting 4-3 victory. Baltimore, which won the series 2-1, had only two hits and trailed 3-0 before rallying against Jeff Montgomery (0-1).

The Orioles were 3-54 last season in games in which they trailed after the eighth inning.

Harold Baines led off the ninth with a home run, his third hit of the game, and Cal Ripken drew a one-out walk before Chris Hoiles singled with two outs. Montgomery then hit pinch-hitter Joe Carter to load the bases and forced in a run by walking Brady Anderson.

"It was a great win for us tonight," Hammonds said. "We came back, and we won the series. Hopefully this will propel us to better things."

Armando Benitez (1-0), the sixth Baltimore pitcher, got the last out in the ninth to earn the victory.

The comeback ruined a fine performance by Kansas City starter Pat Rapp, who allowed two hits over seven scoreless innings in his American League debut. He walked six but struck out three and did not allow a runner past second base.

It all came undone after Montgomery took over.

Johnny Damon matched his career high with four hits for the Royals, who were bidding to win a three-game opening series on the road for the first time since 1977.

"We're only three games into the season. We have a long way to go," Royals manager Tony Muser said.

Baltimore starter Jimmy Key allowed one run and five hits in five innings. The left-hander walked two and struck out five.

Pierce opts to forego senior year for NBA draft

ASSOCIATED PRESS

INGLEWOOD, Calif. — Goodbye, Kansas. Hello, NBA.

Paul Pierce, the All-America forward from Kansas, announced Thursday he is foregoing his senior year to enter the NBA draft in June.

Pierce, who made the announcement at Inglewood High where he starred before going to Kansas, is the first player to leave school early to declare for the NBA draft in Coach Roy Williams' 10 years as coach of the Jayhawks.

"It's always been my dream to play in the NBA ,and hopefully this is a good opportunity for me," Pierce told about 75 friends, former teammates and teachers gathered in the school's gym.

"I feel like it's my time. I feel like I'm more than ready."

Williams, among those in attendance, had told Pierce "to be as selfish as he can be" in making his decision.

The 6-foot-7 Pierce was in his hometown to attend Friday's announcement of the John R. Wooden Award winner, being presented today's at the Los Angeles Athletic Club.

PIERCE

Pierce and teammate Raef LaFrentz, also a first-team All-American, were among the five finalists.

"I told him there was no doubt in my mind that he was ready," Williams said. "I don't think there's any doubt it's the best decision for Paul. The young man has given us three great years."

Before Pierce made his announcement, he and Williams shook hands and embraced at midcourt in the Inglewood High gym.

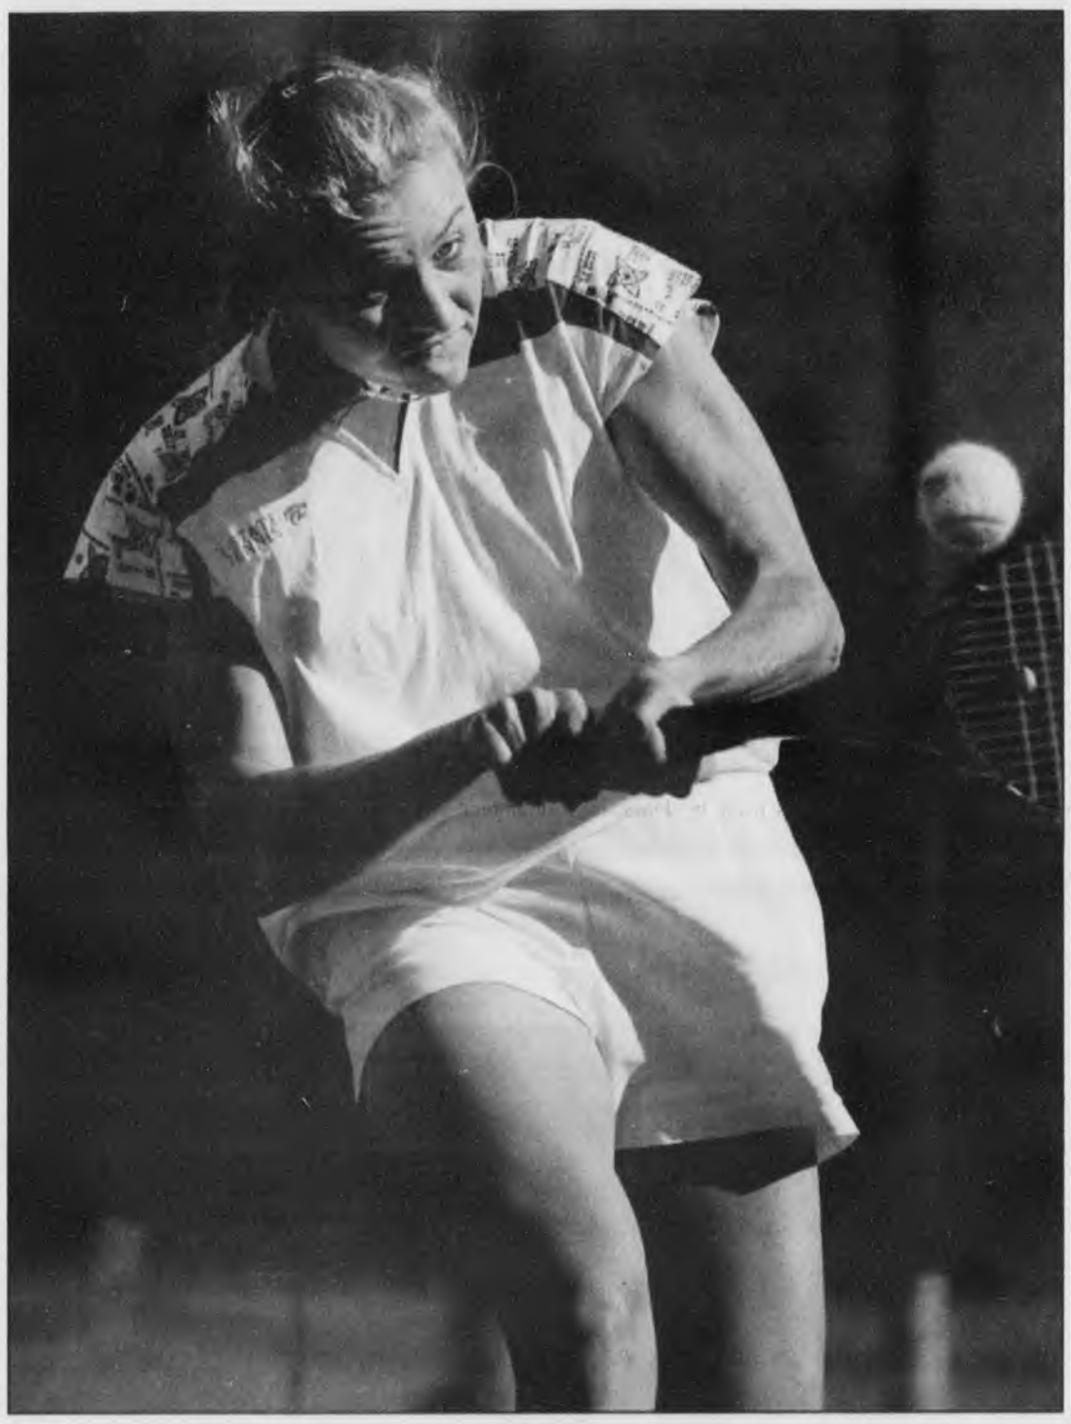
A year ago, after Kansas lost to eventual champion Arizona in the NCAA Tournament, there was speculation about whether neither Pierce or LaFrentz would return.

When the decision that both would be back was announced unexpectedly during halftime of a post-season exhibition game featuring former Kansas players, it brought a standing ovation from the Allen Fieldhouse crowd, and high hopes for this season.

However, Kansas' hopes for a Final Four berth were derailed by a loss to Rhode Island.

"Being in the Final Four was a dream of mine growing up, and I was unable to fulfill that dream, but I feel like I had a great college career and won a lot of games," Pierce said.

Pierce wouldn't elaborate when asked why he was turning pro except to say he's ready now.



Powered by Pierce and LaFrentz, Kansas won the first two Big 12 regular-season and tournament titles the past two seasons while compiling an overall record of 69-6. The only frustration has been a failure to reach the Final Four.

With Pierce on their roster, the Jayhawks were 98-11 over three years.

The graceful, fluid Pierce averaged more than 20 points and six rebounds this season. He took up the slack while LaFrentz was out with a broken finger, and throughout the season proved to be an unselfish player willing to pass off to LaFrentz and other teammates.

Pierce played perhaps his greatest game as a Jayhawk in his last home appearance of the season, when he scored 31 points in an 83-70 victory over Oklahoma that clinched a fourth-straight unbeaten home season.

The victory stretched Kansas' home -court winning streak to 60 games and prompted the crowd to begin chanting, "One more year! One more year!"

Women prepared to turn tide of season this weekend against Sooners, Cowboys

SAM FELSENFELD

The first 10 days of spring have been anything but warm for K-State's tennis team.

The Wildcats have lost three of four matches, including an 8-1 loss at home to intrastate rival Kansas on Wednesday, dropping to 2-4 in Big 12 Conference play, 6-9 overall.

But K-State coach Steve Bietau said he isn't worried about his team's chances this weekend when Oklahoma and Oklahoma State come to Manhattan.

"I really think it's a question of putting things together," he said.

Bietau said because of the nature of team tennis, where a close loss counts for nothing, Wednesday's loss to the Jayhawks wasn't as bad as it looked on paper.

The Cats competed but barely fell short in several matches.

"We absolutely came out to play. Looking at what Martina (Pospisilova) did, and what Anna (Pampoulova) did, and what No. 2 and No. 3 doubles did, we fought extremely hard," Bietau said.

But the bottom line was the 8-1 loss, which Bietau wouldn't excuse.

"You don't lose 8-1 to somebody and think you're on top of the world. You're not," he said.

K-State's first opponent this weekend will be No. 52 Oklahoma at 11 a.m. Saturday at the L.P. Washburn Recreational Area. Some of the Cats faced the Sooners in individual matchups last fall, and Bietau said he knows what they'll be up against.

"They definitely are a good team," Bietau said.

Oklahoma returned its No. 1 player this season, but has two freshmen playing well enough that she dropped down to third. Bietau said the Sooners have excellent depth but are beatable.

"It really depends on how well we play. We've been sporadic throughout the season. However, I'm encouraged by the play of some of the younger players against KU."

The Cats take on Oklahoma State, a team with which Bietau isn't as familiar, at 10 a.m. Sunday at the Rec Area.

"We haven't seen or heard a lot from them this year," he said.

Helping the Cats take on their neighbors to the south will be Lena Piliptchak, who sat out singles play Wednesday because of a back injury. She sustained the injury Saturday during a match at Colorado. She said her back felt pretty good by Wednesday's match, but she stayed out of singles play to prevent reinjuring it.

Bietau said she practiced at about 90- to 95-percent speed on Thursday and felt fine, so she'll be ready to help the Cats avenge their loss to the Hawks against the Sooners on Saturday.

If weather doesn't permit outdoor play, the matches will be moved indoors to Ahearn Field House. Admission is free.

Crew hopes it can accomplish goal by beating Iowa in dual

SAM FELSENFELD
Kansas State Collegian

Entering the season, one of the women's crew team's goals for the year was to beat Iowa and Kansas each time it races against them on the water.

So far, though, long races have brought mixed results.

"We have accomplished this goal with KU, but were 10 seconds behind Iowa at the Head of the Charles with our eight over a 3 1/2 mile race course," Coach Jenny Hale said.

When the team travels to Iowa City, Iowa, this weekend for a double dual against Iowa, Drake and KU, the team will have 2,000 meters to outrow its opponents.

"You have got to be ready to race them when you go out on the water. And not just for the last 500 meters, you have got to be able to race them from the first meter to 2,000th meter," Hale said.

In the sport of rowing, there is a tradition of going and racing one other boat. In this region, athletes have to travel a long way to race, so double duals are becoming more common. Double duals are when four schools compete with each other.

Each boat has different techniques it wants to work on in each race. Heather Megnia, sophomore rower, will be in the second varsity eight.

"Our goal for the race is to stay together. We are pushing hard, but when we don't stay together, we are working against each other," she said. "We are just going to go out there and push hard and see what happens. We have a lot of potential to do well, but we have to accomplish our goal of staying together."

The first varsity eight is the boat the team is prioritizing for these races. This means it should be the fastest boat the team can put together.

Lindsay Smith is the only freshman competing at the varsity level and will be sitting in the two seat of the first varsity eight. Rowing in the priority boat can put added pressure on a rower.

"As a person, it puts pressure on me just because I know I have to row well for everyone to row well. As a boat, it puts pressure on us, because our goal is to beat Iowa and we know the whole team really wants to beat Iowa, and they are going to be there on the line with us," she said.

The team just returned from a week of training during spring break — a week that might end up paying off for the Cats.

"Training really helped us a lot. We really focused on our catches and basically picked apart our stroke. Now we aren't missing as much water. We picked apart our stroke and put it back together slowly and made it better," Smith said.

Start of 1998 baseball season brings random thoughts of Royals, Puff Daddy

VIEWPOINT

DAN MERKER

Dan is a sophomore in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Dan at dmerker@ksu.edu.

With half of baseball season's first week over, I figured I'd ramble about a few things that have made me take note.

•Tuesday afternoon, everything was in place. My 2:05 class was canceled, leaving me a window to watch every pitch of the Royals' opening day game against the Baltimore Orioles. I always try to watch the Royals' opening day, but it can't always happen.

This year, however, would be different. The game was nationally televised on ESPN, so there was no way I'd miss it.

Usually, WIBW-TV broadcasts the opening game for the Royals and uses the feed from the Royals Television Network. When 2 p.m. rolled around, ESPN mysteriously changed to ESPNEWS, the telltale sign the game was blacked out.

I called my cable company, TCI of Kansas, and they told me WIBW-TV had the rights to the game. Sadly, there was a soap opera on WIBW-TV. I called the station to see why the game wasn't on, and WIBW-TV said it didn't have the Royals' rights anymore.

I then called TCI back at about 2:30 p.m., and it said it just found out about this and someone was on the horn with ESPN about getting the game on. Well, I kept my television tuned to ESPN most of the game's duration, and we never got it.

I really didn't care if I saw the national or regional broadcast of the Royals game. I just wanted to watch it. But apparently national television no longer includes Manhattan. Anybody in the country with cable that wasn't from Manhattan could have watched this game. Either they got the game on ESPN or the ESPN broadcast was blacked out and they got the game on the Royals' or Orioles' TV networks.

I understand the blackout rules, and they make sense so the team doesn't lose revenue, but TCI was ignorant and irresponsible in failing to arrange for this nationally televised game to be shown.

I also understand that with limited resources, TCI can't necessarily make sure we have an affiliate of the Royals Television Network, which I don't like but can live with.

But to be considered a part of the Kansas City market and have the game's national broadcast blacked out without a viewing alternative was ridiculous. TCI really screwed this one up and should have this problem rectified by the next time the Royals are on national television. What would have happened if, God forbid, we would have missed a Chiefs game for the same reason?

•For the record, the man's name is Ken Griffey Jr., not Junior Griffey, but you'd never know that by watching a game or SportsCenter. The only man I know of in the major leagues in the past five years with the first name of Junior was Junior Ortiz. Whatever happened to calling a player by his last name?

•Puff Daddy makes me sick. The artist is never without his red Yankees hat. Hey, Puffy, the Yankees wear navy blue and have since the days of Babe Ruth, if you know who he is.

Worse still, he was on a TV show Tuesday and was asked if he was excited for baseball season. He responded that he didn't like baseball. Why are you wearing a Yankees hat then? Do you even realize it's the wrong color?

Worse yet, his influence, along with Mase, one of "The Family," and others, is bringing down baseball. They wear wrong-colored stuff, which influences the public to look just as ridiculous as they do.

Fluorescent green Mariners jerseys? Red Royals hats and jerseys? Fluorescent Braves hats? Yankees stuff that is red, green, yellow, sky blue? Give me a break! It nearly made me puke. Fortunately, I think I saw somebody wearing a Yankees jersey the other day that was the same color as that puke, so it wouldn't have even showed.

The paraphernalia should be in the colors the players wear on the field. It's pretty simple.

It also should be a prerequisite that to buy or wear something of a team, you at least should be able to name a player on that team. Question to all Braves fans — who was No. 3 and what position did he play? No cheating.

Done rambling. Enjoy baseball season, but wear the right color!

President wraps up 12-day trip to Africa

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DAKAR, Senegal — The Clintons came to the end of a long African trip Thursday, happy about the dismissal of Paula Jones' sexual harassment suit. The first lady said they always felt "it would turn out fine."

The president said, "Obviously I'm pleased. And I think the judge's opinion speaks for itself." He said he was looking forward to going home after 12 days to continue "the work of the very ambitious agenda we've got there."

Told that Whitewater prosecutor Kenneth Starr said the decision would not affect his criminal investigations of Clinton, the president said, "I don't have any comment on Mr. Starr."

Back home, many Americans awoke to a TV picture of Clinton chomping a cigar and tapping an African drum after the suit's dismissal. He also strummed a guitar. The instruments were brought by African merchants, and the picture of a happy president was captured through the window of his hotel suite by a Fox News camera.

Separately, Hillary Clinton spoke about the ruling.

"Both Bill and I have felt throughout this whole thing that it would turn out fine, either at a trial or more appropriately as the judge ruled, based on the fact there was no evidence to support these groundless claims," the first lady told American Urban Radio Network.

"So for us, we've paid very little attention to it," she said.

"Our job has been to do everything we could to make America a better place. ... We haven't let any of this other stuff divert us — which is really one of the goals of the people behind all of it ... to try to divert the president's energy, discourage people," Hillary Clinton said. "It hasn't worked. And it will never work because we know what the truth is, and we know what we're trying to accomplish for our country, and we just work on it every single day."

The ruling did not vindicate the president. On that point, the president said, "The nature of the motion would not permit that. But the most important thing is that I can go back now and continue the work that I'm doing."

Asked how Jones' case had affected his presidency, Clinton said he has followed the lead of every president since George Washington — "which is that for the period of your service, insofar as possible, you should cease to be an individual citizen and spend all your time and energy on the country. And that's what I've tried to do. And I've done my best at it, and the results have been satisfactory, I think, for the American people, and that's what I intend to continue to do.

"Others should evaluate that question," he said, "but I need to keep working on the people's business, and that's what I intend to do."

Prospects for successful appeal of harassment judgment look bleak for Jones

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Paula Jones' lawyers will confront an exceedingly difficult endeavor if they seek to revive her sexual harassment lawsuit against President Clinton, legal experts said Thursday.

"Nothing's impossible, but it's very hard to turn around a summary judgment," said Ernest Rossiello, a Chicago lawyer who represents sexual harassment plaintiffs. "I'm reading the Jones decision now, and I think the judge was very correct. She followed the law of her circuit."

On appeal, Jones' legal team would have to convince a three-judge panel of the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that Judge Susan Webber Wright made some error of law in deciding a trial is unnecessary.

They would be bucking a decade-long trend in federal courts of killing lawsuits, especially employment-bias disputes, before they reach a jury.

"District court judges used to routinely deny summary-judgment motions and allow cases to go to trial," said law professor Kathryn Urbonya of William and Mary College. "That all changed with a trilogy of 1986 Supreme Court rulings that encouraged judges to save taxpayers' time and money if a plaintiff's allegations, even when taken as gospel, don't add up to a legal claim."

As a result, said University of Minnesota law professor Suzanna Sherry, "It has become more and more likely that summary judgments won't be reversed.".

That's so, even though the 8th Circuit court would make its own determination of the legal issues in Jones' case, giving no real deference to Judge Wright's findings.

The judge's ruling on Wednesday said the allegations made by Jones, if true, could not amount to illegal sexual harassment. The judge rejected two separate theories of harassment the lawsuit had advanced:

—That then-Gov. Clinton's actions had created a hostile environment in her workplace.

—That he had committed what lawyers call "quid-pro-quo" sexual harassment by linking job-advancement opportunities to sexual favors and threatening retaliation if those favors were withheld.

To the first, Judge Wright said the one incident alleged in the lawsuit did not amount to the sustained and pervasive conduct needed to show a hostile work environment.

To the second, she said a quid-pro-quo harassment claim must allege some job-related harm as a result of sexual favors being withheld.

Federal appeals courts are split on the second point, and the Supreme Court is expected to resolve the matter after hearing arguments in a Chicago case later this month.

It's conceivable that if the Supreme Court says no showing of job-related harm is required, the 8th Circuit Court would order Judge Wright to restudy Jones' case in light of that new standard.

But the judge might have anticipated that possibility. Her 39-page decision said Jones would not be able to prove quid-pro-quo harassment under any standard because she never sufficiently alleged that Clinton threatened her.

"She merely states that 'reading between the lines' she knew what the governor meant" in mentioning her direct supervisor's name, the judge said. "The governor's alleged statements do not in any way constitute a clear threat that clearly conditions concrete job benefits or detriments on compliance with sexual demands."

Golf course plans in limbo; construction date delayed were received in June and July of 1997, and $6.7 million already has been donated.

What remains to be done before construction begins is the annexation of the property by the city of Manhattan.

The decision to annex the property will be made at Monday's meeting of the Manhattan Area Urban Planning Board, when the board will decide whether the golf course lies in a potential growth area for the city, said Eric Cattell, assistant director for planning in Manhattan. The course will be north of Kimball Drive and west of Seth Childs Road, near the Farm Bureau building.

By being annexed by the city, the property and any communities developed around it will have the same utilities — running water, electricity, telephone service, sewage and waste treatment — that other Manhattan areas have.

"Basically, they've requested annexation of the golf course. It's approximately 315 acres for the golf course, and along with that, they've requested annexation of another 62 acres they call Grand Mere Heights, which is the residential portion," Cattell said.

Cattell said the land needed to be annexed and zoned within the city and utility extensions need to be made before construction could begin. The land is zoned within Riley County as a planned unit development.

"The county's role was to initially zone it within the county through what's called a planned unit development to allow them to begin construction of the course," said Monty Wedel, planning and special projects director for Riley County.

He said the process of setting aside land for a planned unit development establishes little in terms of pinpointing how the land will be used specifically. Rather, he said, all the zoning will take place after the land is annexed by the city.

Student ticket prices increase for 1998 season

peting with the Nebraskas, Texas A&Ms and Texases that have about 30,000 more seats in their stadiums that we don't. They get more revenue there that we just can't get until we have a bigger stadium."

The new season ticket package offered to the public is called the 5+2=7 Great Games Special. Holders of these season tickets can use seats that are unused by the visiting teams' fans. When the seats are wanted by visitors, the 5+2=7 ticket holders will sit in the chairs set up in the north end zone.

K-State is obligated to offer 4,000 seats to visiting schools. Cavello said most visiting schools only bring about 2,000 visitors. The only perennial exception to those numbers is Nebraska.

"Nebraska has already said that they will use the full 4,000 seats and Texas has said they will probably use all of theirs, too," he said. "That is why it called the 5+2 package."

Brown, said the 5+2=7 package is a good opportunity for the public to get season tickets.

"With the stadium expansion coming, this is pointed at the public and is a way to add to the number of season tickets that we sell to our games," he said.

"NEVER MIND THE TIME. WHAT DAY IS IT?"

Worshipping by the book

Basic beliefs summarized in the Nicene Creed, in its original form:

I believe in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and of all things, visible and invisible,
And in one Lord, Jesus Christ, the son of God, the only begotten, begotten of the Father before all worlds, Light of Light, Very God of Very God, begotten, not made, of one essence with the Father by whom all things were made, who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven, and was incarnate of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary and was made man, and was crucified also for us under Pontius Pilate, suffered, and was buried, and the third day He rose again, and ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of the Father, and shall come again with glory to judge the living and the dead, whose kingdom shall have no end,
And I believe in the Holy Spirit, the Lord and Giver of Life, who proceeds from the Father, who with the Father and the Son is worshipped and glorified, who spake by the prophets,
And I believe in One Holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church, I acknowledge one baptism for the remission of sins, I look for the resurrection of the dead and the life of the world to come.

Steady fasting, confession in store for Orthodox Christians during Lent

▶EATING PUSHED TO THE BACK BURNER DURING CELEBRATION OF CHRIST'S RESURRECTION.

DAVID YETTER
Special to the Kansas State Collegian

"O Lord and Master of my life, take from me the spirit of idleness, despondency, ambition, and idle talk." The worshipers kneel and fall prostrate. "Give rather a spirit of chastity, humblemindedness, patience and love." Again prostrations. "Yea, O Lord and King, grant me to see my own failings and not to condemn my brother, for thou art blessed unto ages of ages. Amen." Prostrations a third time.

It is March 2, 1998: at the hour of Vespers. Lent is beginning. The faithful gather — in chapels converted from garages, borrowed spaces, churches newly restored after desecration by atheistic Communists, or glorious Byzantine temples alight with candles reflecting in icons of Christ, the Virgin Mary and the Saints — and say for the first time the Lenten prayer of St. Ephriam the Syrian. More prostrations follow as each of the faithful falls before every other, asking and pronouncing forgiveness of sins.

For the world's 300 million Orthodox Christians, Lent begins, not on a Wednesday with ash-disfigured faces, but on a Sunday evening, with washed faces as Our Lord commanded, and the mutual asking and giving of forgiveness. For us the date of Holy Pascha, as the feast of Christ's Resurrection is properly called, is still calculated using the ancient method adopted throughout the Church after the Council of Nicea, falling this year on April 19. To the 40 days' fast is attached a separate fast of Great and Holy Week, and the solemn feasts of the Annunciation and Palm Sunday so that Lent begins seven weeks earlier.

For Orthodox Christians, this is a time for spiritual effort. Even those who do not commonly make their Confessions do so during the Great Fast in preparation for Pascha. Most keep some part of fast; the more pious undertake stricter disciplines of prayer and keep the entire fast as prescribed by the Church's canons. Within the past year or so, some leading evangelical Protestants have rediscovered what the Orthodox Church has always known and has always done — one must prepare for Easter by fasting.

What Orthodox Christians believe and do is what the Church has always believed and done, perhaps restated more clearly in response to challenges or adapted to fit new circumstances, but still the Apostles' teaching, the prayers, and the breaking of the bread.

Our Liturgies are derived in form from the worship of the Old Covenant, both synagogue and temple. The oldest was composed by the Apostle James. Governance of the Church is still by councils of bishops as in Apostolic times (see Acts 15, and if there is any doubt that the Apostles were the first bishops, read Acts 1:20 in the original Greek).

We still see salvation in Christ in the same terms as the Apostles: "run[ning] with endurance the race that is set before us," holding that "faith without works is dead," and looking not only for the forgiveness of our sins, but for the fulfillment of the "exceedingly great and precious promises [through which we] may be partakers of the divine nature." "Be ye perfect as your Father in Heaven is perfect," and "I said, 'You are gods'." (Ps. 82:2, quoted by Jesus in John 11:2), are not awkward texts, but descriptions of the glorification of those being saved in Christ.

So strong is this emphasis on becoming through grace what Christ is by nature, that some deny Orthodoxy is religion. Like secularism, religion divides the world into secular and sacred. Secularism reduces the sacred to a private option; religion seeks a general accommodation with it. Orthodox Christianity rejects this sacred/secular division as death — the separation of the world from its True Life, who is God — a division overcome universally by Jesus Christ the God-Man, to be overcome individually in each Christian's life. Great Lent is a season for particular effort in overcoming this division, for "working out [our] salvation with fear and trembling" in a particularly concentrated way.

Russian male choir to perform 11th-century chants

CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

Tonight, Manhattan is invited to explore a kind of music that has lasted for six centuries and survived social upheaval in Russia.

The Arte Corale, an all-male ensemble originating from the Archangel Gabriel Church in Moscow and directed by Tamara Piliptschuk, is scheduled to perform as part of the McCain Performance Series at 8 tonight in St. Thomas More Catholic Church.

Arte Corale specializes in Russian Orthodox music, including Russian chants from the 11th century.

Arte Corale was formed in 1978. At this time, Russian scholars and professors worked to reconstruct the Russian Orthodox tradition, which had died when the Kremlin closed the church shortly after the Revolution of 1917.

Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium, said he admired the fact that Russian Orthodox music has maintained this style for so long.

"This is a tradition that spans a thousand years," Martin said. "This music has gone through so many changes over the years."

Martin also said he enjoyed the fact that the text of the music is enhanced by the music's style.

"In Russian orthodoxy, the text is so important because it takes you to a whole different realm," he said. "If you don't understand what the choir is singing about, it's more difficult to enjoy."

Arte Corale has toured throughout Russia and Europe and had its North American debut tour in 1996.

During performances, Arte Corale sings everything from its traditional Russian chants to 19th- and 20th-century Russian liturgical music.

As for the location of the concert, Martin said it was impossible to have the concert at McCain Auditorium because the annual SpringDance is scheduled there tonight. Besides, he said, having the concert in a church would give the audience a better mood for the music.

"A concert of this sort probably plays better in a church," Martin said. "The location disposes the audience to listen with a different kind of attention."

In Martin's years as director of McCain, there has been only one concert outside of McCain. The concert was in All Faiths Chapel.

With an audience of 400 to 600 expected for tonight's performance, Martin said he thought the audience would benefit from the variety of music that Arte Corale performs.

"We want to expose people to art forms they may not know much about," Martin said.

Native American sees his art as means of recording history

DIANA LEE
Kansas State Collegian

He said he considers his work neither traditional nor contemporary. Combining traditional ideas and modern styles, Jackie (Blackhorse) Tointigh depicts the history of Native Americans.

Tointigh, a Native American artist of Kiowa-Apache descent, presented a lecture for Native American Heritage Monthon Thursday afternoon at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

Tointigh is considered an important artist of the Southern Plains, and his career spans two decades.

"I've been experimenting with art in this way for about 15 years. It gives me more freedom with my work. I live an abstract life, and my art reflects this," Tointigh said.

Tointigh said he has seen Native American art flourish over the past 20 years.

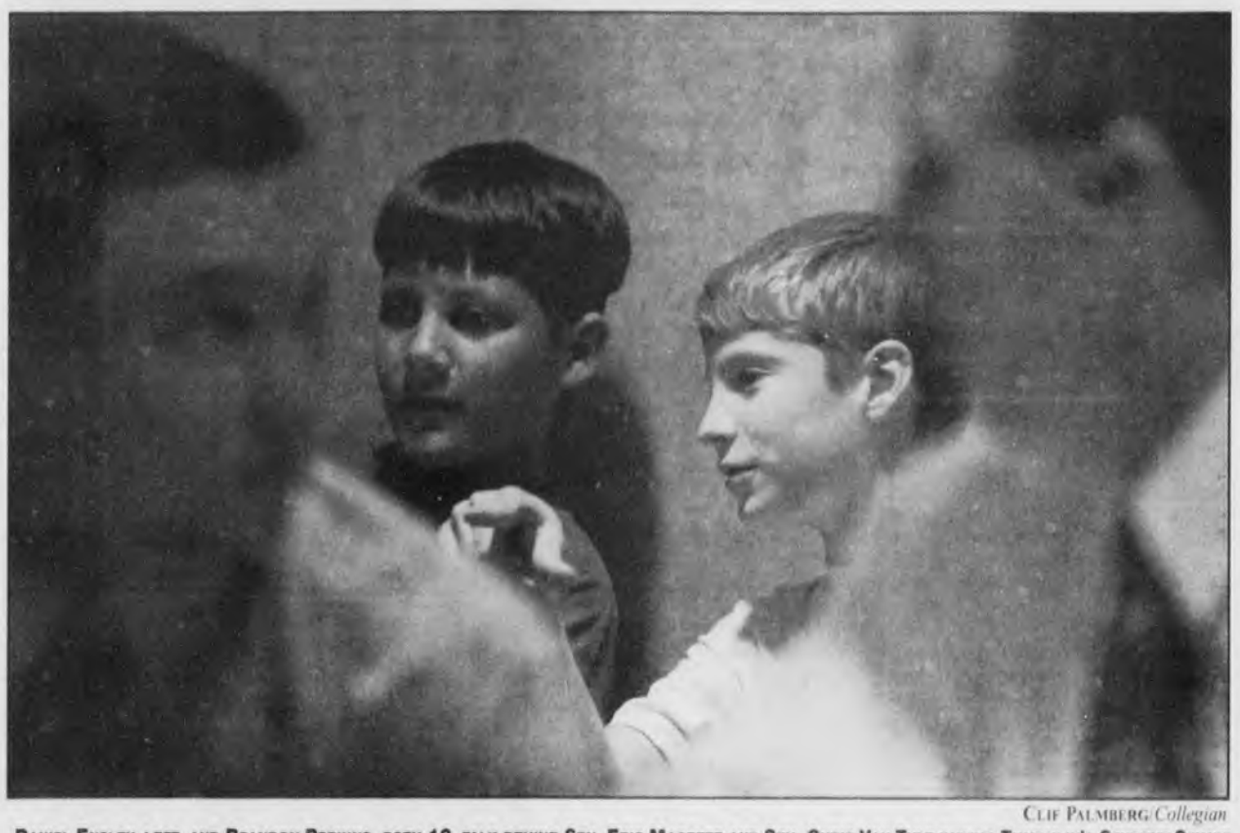
"A lot of Native American children are going to school and studying their culture's art and dance and sharing it with their friends. It is good to bring in bead workers and storytellers as well as artists," Tointigh said.

Tointigh discussed his ideas about honoring women through his artwork, as well as his culture's great respect for women.

"Many artists put male warriors up front, but I just call them male chauvinists. We have a lot of respect for women, for mother and for Mother Earth. My grandfather calls woman the maker of nations," he said.

Tointigh showed one of his pieces, an abstract work depicting a woman in water, that he said expresses the idea that women's roles are fundamental to Native Americans and their ways.

Tointigh also shared stories of his ancestors' heritage and history, as well as explaining his culture's use of peyote as a part of its religious practices.



"The Native American Church, which is an organized church recognized by the American government, has a sacrament similar to when Catholics go to church and drink wine and eat bread," he said.

Tointigh said the only place one can have a religious experience with peyote is within a tepee in worship, where participants sing songs and pray for their families and homes Other tribes in the Southwest do sell peyote to people for uses other than religious ones, but Tointigh said this is not condoned behavior.

"It is their own fault if they are affected badly by this. They are not having religious experiences because they are not using it in the right way," he said.

Tointigh said that coming to speak to students is important to him as a Native American and an artist.

"My people passed through this area fighting other tribes and the Spaniards and the Europeans when they came over here. We have history here to share," Tointigh said.

Tango lessons prove popular

ALICIA TERRELL
Kansas State Collegian

During the last few semesters at K-State, dance lessons have become a popular hobby for many people in the community. Because of their popularity, the tango lessons offered for this April already have been filled.

Dance pairs will meet for four lessons from 7 to 8:30 p.m. every weekend this month at Union Station in the K-State Student Union. The first class will start this Sunday. Because of a lack of space, the tango lessons had to be limited to 30 couples.

Paul Donovan, adviser of Union Program Council, said UPC was unable to reserve the Union Ballroom on Sunday nights for the lessons, so not as many people were able to sign up.

"The class is full right now," he said, "but I believe the instructor, Mike Bennett, has a waiting list for those who still want to participate."

Donovan said when swing dance lessons were offered, the ballroom was full.

"It's become a very popular thing on campus," he said.

The cost for the tango class is $10 per person and $15 per couple.

"Most of the people attending are students, not faculty," Anna Levings, UPC multicultural chairwoman, said.

Levings also said the tango has become so popular, UPC is looking into having other kinds of lessons next semester.

"This is the second time this year tango lessons have been offered," she said. "I know that Bennett teaches several different types of dance, so we thought we might try something different for next year. Nothing is set right now."

Levings said people found out about the lessons from fliers around the Union and from students of previous classes who want to take the lessons again.

"I'm actually taking the lessons," Levings said. "I have a partner, but I'm kind of nervous because I'm not very coordinated."

Business expo gives firms line to students

More than 180 Manhattan businesses are setting up booths this weekend to show consumers the products and services they have to offer.

More info?
Expo 98 business booths will be in both Bramlage Coliseum and Brandeberry Indoor Complex. The event is open to the public from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. Saturday and from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Sunday. Admission is free.

Expo '98 is an annual home and business show sponsored by the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce and Manhattan Area Builders Association in an effort to increase contact between area businesses and consumers, said Eileen Roufa, vice president of member services at the chamber.

Roufa said she thought the show will be of interest to all Manhattan residents, including K-State students.

"K-State students might be interested in remaining in this area after graduation," Roufa said. "They might be impressed with the great number of businesses in the area.

"You never know when you might meet a future employer."

Roufa said several businesses will offer free prizes and food, which should draw a crowd.

She said she hopes some area businesses will benefit from the exposure, because they are not located in high-traffic areas.

"Many people are very surprised at the existence of some businesses," Roufa said. "These businesses have to be very proactive in marketing their products and services. They don't usually have 8,000 people walking by their front door."

Nikki Vestweber, sales manager at It's Greek to Me, said a big reason for its participation is its location on Kansas Highway 177, which is not a high-traffic area.

"With our location, it's a way for us to go to them," she said of potential customers.

Vestweber said It's Greek to Me tries to focus on other businesses at the expo and the students who come to get large group and company orders of promotional materials, such as shirts.

"A lot of the K-State people come in and want to do group orders with their organizations," she said. "We distribute catalogs and give price quotes there."

Wally Post, general manager of Century Business Systems, said his business always has participated in the expo, because it is an opportunity to get word out about its products.

"If you can just plant a seed," he said. "Any time you can get exposure to 5,000 to 8,000 people, sure it's going to improve your business."

Post said he thought Expo '98 could be a good opportunity for college students as well.

"Someday they might have a business of their own," he said. "It gives them exposure to what's in the market."

Post said he has employed many K-State students at his business part-time, and the event is a good way to meet employers.

"They even get a free note pad if they come by," he said.

Legal career preview to aid students courting future career as lawyers

LORY STONE
Kansas State Collegian

Going into the law profession can be like a journey into the mysterious if students have no previous exposure to the courtroom.

Tim Henderson, assistant director of Career and Employment Services and a lawyer, said his undergraduate studies never brought him into direct contact with the field of law.

"I went to K-State as an undergraduate where my whole focus was to go to law school. I got good grades and spent my time preparing for the LSAT. But I never went to law offices or saw what classes law schools offered," Henderson said.

With this frame of mind, Henderson teamed up with Beth Powers, academic and pre-law adviser, and together they began work on a program that would give prospective law students more insight to the field.

The result: the K-State Legal Career Preview.

"We started brainstorming, and came up with the idea to set up a program. We thought of a full-time internship, but agreed that it may be too time consuming for students. Shadowing seemed like a better approach because it would give students a taste of what attorneys do and allow them to work with more than one attorney," Powers said.

Henderson and Powers said they talked with 54 lawyers, most of whom are K-State alumni, who were positive about participating in the program. The lawyers are from throughout Kansas — Topeka, Wichita, Manhattan, Junction City, Salina and the Kansas City-metro area. The variety of locations makes the program viable throughout both the summer and academic year.

Powers said the program would allow for one-day sessions, but it has the potential of blossoming into something greater.

"There are no parameters. You and the attorney decide how long you want to work together. There is no preconceived time limit. Students should feel free to accept offers, but we don't encourage one way or another," Powers said.

"It is really a self-perpetuating program."

Powers and Henderson have created a notebook containing the names, phone numbers and fields of law for each of the 54 lawyers. The different areas of practice include civil litigation, corporate litigation, criminal, government practice, in-house counsel and judging.

"Students should take advantage of as many areas of law as possible. They should shadow several lawyers to educate themselves and get a small taste of what these people do. It will affect what courses to take in law school and how to advertise yourself after you graduate," Henderson said.

To become involved, Henderson can be contacted at 532-6506 and Powers at 532-6900.

"We encourage all students to call. We realize it's a busy time right after spring break, but the program will continue through the summer and fall," Henderson said.

Millions flock to Mecca for worship

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MECCA, Saudi Arabia — From across the world, more than 2 million Muslims swathed in white arrived in the holy city of Mecca on Sunday to perform the annual pilgrimage that for many fulfills a lifelong dream.

Hoping to prevent a catastrophe similar to last year, when a fire killed at least 343 people and injured 1,500, Saudi authorities are using fireproof tents and have banned pilgrims from cooking inside them.

The hajj, packed with symbolism and ritual, is one of the cornerstones of Islam and every able-bodied Muslim who can afford to must perform it at least once.

"I had a dream before I came here that I was going for the hajj and now I'm here," said Haji Abdullah of Brunei. "I'm very lucky to be here. It's unbelievable. If I have a chance to come back, I definitely will."

For the hajj, men wrap themselves in white sheets, and women wear modest white robes. On arriving in Mecca, they circle the Kaaba, a cubic stone structure inside the Grand Mosque. Muslims turn toward the Kaaba, Islam's holiest site, five times each day for prayer.

The pilgrimage culminates today, when the pilgrims gather on Mount Arafat, 12 miles from Mecca in the desert, where the Prophet Mohammed gave his last sermon 14 centuries ago.

Authorities have commissioned more than 20,000 buses to transport the pilgrims to Mina, a plain 6 miles north of Mecca, where they will begin their ascent. Some pilgrims left early, trekking to the mountain Sunday evening by foot or in vehicles.

The pilgrims will spend the night in tents, about 10,000 of which — one-fourth of the total at Mina — are fireproof.

Just 50 years ago, the pilgrimage might have attracted only 10,000 people. This year, it is expected to draw 2.3 million.

K-State Muslims planning local celebration this week

TIM RICHARDSON
Kansas State Collegian

As Muslims from around the world gather in Mecca, Saudi Arabia for an annual pilgrimage, K-State Muslims also can participate in their own celebration.

Muslim Student Association adviser Ekramul Haque said each able-bodied Muslim who has the financial means to travel to Mecca is obligated to make the pilgrimage at least once.

A prayer at 8 a.m. Tuesday at the Islamic Center of Manhattan will observe the pilgrimage. Haque said students who are interested also can sacrifice an animal at a local farm, a practice that observes pre-biblical events.

"Students can buy a lamb or goat and sacrifice it in the name of the Lord," he said.

Only Muslims who can afford to purchase the animal traditionally participate in the sacrifice. The food is then distributed to family members, and those who do not have the money to purchase an animal.

Haque said a lamb is sacrificed for an individual, whereas a cow is for seven people.

"If you're a rich man, you have lots of savings, and then it would be mandatory to sacrifice an animal," he said. "The people who are poor are not required to sacrifice it."

Khalid Kebbati, president of the Muslim Student Association, said about 25 to 30 local families probably will participate in sacrificing an animal.

"Not all of them do, because we have lots of single students here without families," he said.

Kebbati said it is common for Muslims to send money to their families in other countries, so an animal can be sacrificed for relatives.

Haque, who is from Bangladesh, gives money to his family to help purchase an animal. A special process must be followed when sacrificing the animal, which begins with slitting the throat of the animal, allowing as much blood as possible to drain.

The pilgrimage, which is the last of the five pillars of Islam, usually lasts for about two to three days.

"This symbolizes unity among Muslims," Haque said. "You reflect on what happened during Mohammed's time."

The Prophet Mohammed gave his last sermon near Mecca 14 centuries ago.

Muslims participating in the pilgrimage are required to wear uniform attire, so the economic background of the pilgrims is not evident.

Haque said the number of Muslims worldwide continues to increase. Muslims now make up about one-fifth of the world's population, with about 1.1 billion people.

"The number of Muslims around the world has increased tremendously," he said. "They come from all corners of the globe."

Open house draws thousands to campus

K-State faculty and students planned and presented the All-University Open House that was host to an expected 20,000 prospective students and other visitors.

The purpose of the annual open house is to attract potential students to K-State.

All nine colleges and K-State-Salina offered special activities. They also had displays and information available to prospective students.

The entire first floor of the K-State Student Union was given over to the College of Arts and Sciences for booths. The College of Engineering showed sumo wrestling robots. Visitors could participate in a Las Vegas-style casino sponsored by the College of Business Administration. The College of Human Ecology sponsored an open-air cafe.

About 2,000 students from various organizations and the residence halls volunteered to work at open house.

Kevin McKinney, junior in electrical engineering, spent the day working at Durland Hall for the College of Engineering's open house activities and giving tours of Goodnow Hall.

McKinney said giving the tours was a way to take pride in his residence hall.

McKinney said the tours might be a way to attract prospective students to the residence halls. He said the tours personalized the experience.

"It gives people an idea of what benefits there are to living in the dorms," McKinney said.

Lawrence High School senior Jessica Shirk said she will be attending K-State in the fall, but visited during open house to learn more about the university.

"I got to find out what the dorms are like and get more information," Shirk said.

Shirk plans to major in agriculture education. She said visiting the displays set up by the various colleges helped her to finalize her decision.

Open house offered different opportunities than a regular campus visit, Shirk said. She said she was able to learn more because everything was open and available.

Shirk's father, David Shirk, said what impressed him most about K-State was the students' attitudes.

"Everyone was friendly and helpful," he said.

Open house was not just for prospective students and their families.

Sarah Ketter, freshman in elementary education, visited the displays put on by the College of Architecture, Planning and Design and the engineering college.

Ketter said it was fun to see the projects students spent so much time working on.

"They offered a lot of really neat things to look at," Ketter said.

Ketter said although she never had attended open house as a prospective student, if she had, it would have made her more sure that she wanted to attend K-State.

She said it offers a good opportunity for prospective students to obtain information about K-State.

Social Security reform tops Clinton trip to K.C.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Eighty-year-old Byron Banta, a Lee Summit, Mo., man who gets half his monthly income from Social Security, has nearly lost his patience with politicians.

"I haven't totally given up on them," he said of local and national leaders, who for years have talked — and only talked — about saving Social Security from bankruptcy. "But I would like someone to put a fire under them. Something — I don't know what — needs to be done."

On Tuesday, President Clinton comes to Kansas City for a town meeting on Social Security, promising this time to turn talk into action.

At Leawood Middle School in suburban Kansas City, 13-year-old Ben Stafford and his classmates have been reading about government policy, studying Internet sites and talking to grandparents to prep themselves for the president's visit.

The experience, Stafford said, has been eye-opening.

"I think we'll have to know what we're getting into," he said. "I think it's going to be hard to make sure (Social Security) keeps going by the time I'm old enough to get back what I'll be putting into it."

No shortage of questions and opinions await Clinton, who will join an expected handful of Republican and Democratic members of Congress and a panel of Social Security experts at the four-hour forum Tuesday organized by the American Association of Retired Persons and the Concord Coalition.

Clinton asked the groups to sponsor a series of four such meetings after calling for a national dialogue on Social Security during his State of the Union speech. Without changes, some fear Social Security will not be able to handle the looming retirements of 77 million baby boomers.

Kansas City was picked to kick off the series because of its balanced demographics and distance from "the routine of the Washington beltway," said John Rother of the AARP.

Even with the president in attendance and the excitement of the national spotlight, four hours spent talking about anything sounds like a long time.

But for folks like 85-year-old Doris Carpenter, the meeting might not be long enough to start a serious dialogue on reforming the troubled system.

King's legacy remembered 30 years after assassination

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MEMPHIS, Tenn. — Friends and followers of Martin Luther King Jr. commemorated the 30th anniversary of his death Saturday by finishing a march for justice he never lived to complete.

King was murdered in Memphis on April 4, 1968, while helping organize a strike by city sanitation workers. A protest march with King in the lead had been planned four days later.

Saturday's 4,000 marchers followed much the same route the original demonstration was to take. The march was among several scheduled across the country Saturday to honor King's memory.

James Nelson, 34, carried a replica of the famous "I Am A Man" sign favored by strikers in 1968.

"This is history, and I want to be part of it," Nelson said. "I want to make sure people my age ... don't forget the dream. I don't want to let Dr. King down."

The Rev. Samuel "Billy" Kyles, chief organizer of a series of anniversary events called "Pilgrimage to Memphis," led the marchers under overcast skies with the Rev. Jesse Jackson; Memphis Mayor W.W. Herenton, the city's first elected black mayor; and Washington, D.C., Mayor Marion Barry, a Memphis native.

The crowd, stretching for more than a half-dozen blocks, sang "We Shall Overcome," "Ain't Nobody Gonna Turn Us Around" and other standards of the civil rights movement.

Many carried pictures of King or signs saying "Remember the Man and the Message."

King's last march, on March 28, 1968, in Memphis, ended in violence when a group of rowdy young protesters began breaking store windows. Police moved in with clubs and tear gas.

The National Guard was called in the following day, and the city was put under a curfew. King left town vowing to return to stage another march, this one peaceful.

He never got the chance.

King was felled by a single rifle slug on the balcony of The Lorraine Motel, now the National Civil Rights Museum, while preparing to go to dinner with Kyles, Jackson and other associates.

James Earl Ray, a prison escapee from Missouri, pleaded guilty to killing King and is Intense lobbying helps prevent House vote to lower blood alcohol level nationwide

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Intense lobbying by the liquor and restaurant industries helped prevent a House vote on legislation lowering the threshold of drunkenness behind the wheel.

Such laws should be left to the states, not Washington, D.C., said the Republican committee chairman whose panel kept the measure off the House floor. But its Democratic sponsor said the committee action proves unmistakably the liquor lobby put profits ahead of people's lives.

The legislation was an amendment to a giant highway spending bill that would have taken highway money away from states that don't enact .08 percent blood alcohol content levels for drunken driving.

A month ago, the Senate passed such an amendment to its highway bill by a strong 62-32 vote, and President Clinton has endorsed a national .08 percent standard that already is in force in 16 states.

Liquor and restaurant groups admit that after losing in the Senate, they waged a full-court effort in the House. The National Beer Wholesalers Association and the American Beverage Institute ran large ads in Capitol Hill newspapers, sent letters to lawmakers and had wholesalers and brewers write or fax their representatives.

Supporters of .08 percent said it is more lenient than drunken driving levels in most European countries, that it would save at least 600 lives a year and that it makes no sense for drinkers to be legal behind the wheel in one state and not in another.

Both sides promise they'll be back for another round in late April, when Senate and House negotiators meet to decide what drunken driving language will be in the final bill they send to the president.

Half of Milli Vanilli duo dies in Germany

HAMBURG, Germany — Rob Pilatus, a former model whose career as half the pop music duo Milli Vanilli crashed in disgrace and drug addiction after it was revealed that the group lip-synced its songs, has died, the Bild am Sonntag newspaper said Sunday. He was 32.

Pilatus was alone when he died late Thursday in a Frankfurt hotel room after consuming alcohol and pills, the newspaper said.

The newspaper quoted Milli Vanilli producer Frank Farian as saying Pilatus had been drinking Thursday evening, but "we didn't know ... that he was taking tablets that are very dangerous with alcohol."

An autopsy was being conducted to determine the exact cause of death, the newspaper said.

Frankfurt police refused to comment.

MONTY PETERSON, TOP, SHOWS A LAWN MOWER TO A CUSTOMER AT BROOKS YAMAHA'S BOOTH AT EXPO '98 SUNDAY AFTERNOON AT BRAMLAGE COLISEUM. FIVE AWARD OF EXCELLENCE PLAQUES WERE GIVEN TO THE BUSINESSES THAT HAD THE BEST BOOTHS.

Expo '98 gives exposure to businesses

ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

Manhattan residents were busy during the weekend.

Not only did the All-University Open House become a family outing for many Manhattan residents, but Expo '98 also attracted many residents from Manhattan and the surrounding area.

Expo '98 is an annual business and home show held at Bramlage Coliseum and Brandeberry Indoor Complex.

Vi Fogerson, Expo '98 chairwoman, said she was pleased with the turnout this year. She said Expo '98 is a great opportunity for Manhattan businesses.

"It was really exceptional," Fogerson said. "It is tremendous exposure for the businesses to display their wares."

Fogerson said five Award of Excellence plaques were given to the businesses who had the best booths.

"We've always done this, but this year we didn't do first, second and third places," she said. "We just gave five businesses an Award of Excellence."

The booths are judged on many criteria, including interaction with people, display, use of color and use of technology, Fogerson said.

The winners for the business displays were Friends of Sunset Zoo, Harrah's Prairie Band Casino, Regulator Time Co., Quality Movers Express and Complete Music.

Underneath flashing strobe lights and a disco ball, Complete Music account representative Andrea Morris said it did many things to win the Award of Excellence.

"We set up a lot of new props to get a lot of crowd participation," she said. "Our main focus was to get people involved and have a lot of fun."

Morris said Complete Music's video karaoke attracted many customers.

"We're giving away a free T-shirt to anyone who would like to do karaoke," she said.

Amanda Kelly, Expo '98 assistant chairwoman, said visitors to the event also had chances to win prizes throughout the weekend.

"When people come in, they can register to win prizes," she said. "Some exhibitors also have their own individual drawings, and we announce the winners over the intercom.

"We've given away a lot of gift certificates for places like Gold Fork, Harrah's Prairie Band Casino and hotel stays at Ramada," Kelly said. "We've also given away tickets for Kaw Valley Rodeo and Country Stampede among many other things."

Paula Enlow, Manhattan resident, said she came to the expo for the chance to win some of those prizes.

"We won some brass lamps a couple of years ago," she said. "This year we haven't won anything. We've just gotten lots of candy."

Amy Naylor, Manhattan resident, said the show helped her make connections with businesses in town she wasn't aware of.

Lee Brown, Manhattan resident for 54 years, said he came to the expo with an interest in boats.

"I knew they had a boat show," he said. "I like to fish, and I like to see the displays."

Brown said he and his wife attend Expo '98 every year.

"It gives you a lot of ideas, and we can see new products," Louise Brown, Lee Brown's wife, said.

There was also an outdoor show of boats, bicycles, lawn mowers, motorcycles and games for kids, including a pedal pull.

Youth tractor pull highlights events at business expo

Children driving tractors greeted the eyes of attendees of Expo '98 when they walked up to Bramlage Coliseum Saturday afternoon.

About 100 children came to Expo '98 to compete in the Pedal Power Tractor Pull sponsored by "Kids" Pedal Power Tractor Pulls.

LeighAnn VanDeCreek, part owner of the business, said the competition consists of kids pulling weight on a tractor on a 30-foot track.

"When they start to pedal, the weight begins to slowly move up," she said. "The object is to see how far the child can pull before the weight stops them. A full pull is 30 feet."

> "HE DIDN'T WANT TO DO IT THE FIRST TIME HE COMPETED, BUT HE WON IT AND GOT A BIG TROPHY. HE'S LIKED IT EVER SINCE."
> DAN WHITEHAIR
> Abilene resident

VanDeCreek said children between the ages of four and 12 can compete in the pedal pull. She said first-, second- and third-place winners receive medals, and first- and second-place winners can go to the state fair.

"We sign up the top-two kids in every age class to compete in the big Kansas State pull at the the state fair in Hutchinson," she said.

VanDeCreek said there were 932 contestants at last year's state fair.

"If you win at the state fair, the top two boys and top two girls go to nationals," she said. "There are 22 states involved. From national pull, the top two in each age class go to the international power pull."

VanDeCreek said she enjoys putting on the pedal pulls.

"This is the third year we've come to Expo '98, and we've been in the pedal pulling business for 15 years," she said.

VanDeCreek said some parents take their children to several pedal pulls doing the summer.

"We send out an itinerary to where we will be each summer, and some kids follow us everywhere," she said.

"Some kids have so many trophies that their dads are having to build trophy cases."

Children from Kansas towns such as Sylvan Grove, Lincoln, Ellinwood, Abilene and Lawrence came to Expo '98 for the pedal pull, VanDeCreek said.

Dan and Delynne Whitehair, Abilene, brought their 9-year-old son to the expo. They said this was the third year their son had been competing in pedal pulls.

"He didn't want to do it the first time he competed, but he won it and got a big trophy," Dan Whitehair said. "He's liked it ever since."

Delynne Whitehair said they get a schedule from the VanDeCreeks and go to as many pedal pulls as they can.

"A lot of the places we go, we run into the same people. We cheer each other's kids on," she said.

Nine-year-old Rebecca Richmond, Herrington, Kan., said she loves the pedal pulls.

"I started doing them because of interest," she said. "My favorite thing is the competition."

Richmond said she has been to nationals five times.

Volunteer chairwoman for Expo '98 Marie Dellen said the pedal pull was started three years ago for the kids who come with their parents.

"We needed something for the kids to do to make it more of a family thing then just a business show," Dellen said. "It brings in a lot of people. They come from all over."

International Week brings world's culture to KSU

Without leaving the comfy confines of K-State this week, students can have a genuine international experience.

The parade of flags this afternoon is just the beginning of this week's activities to promote the culture and background of K-State students and professors.

In the wake of recent conversations about diversity, including last week's diversity forum in the K-State Student Union, this is a great opportunity to get involved.

The students who helped organize these events should be applauded. Not only have they become educated about their own cultures and background, but they took it a step further.

By participating in dances, demonstrations and exhibitions, students are sharing their background and educating others.

This week offers a great chance for students to get to know one another. Countries often are divided by cultural differences and actual physical barriers, but at K-State, we're here together and sharing experiences.

Students can learn about other countries and people by meeting face-to-face and asking questions. Discussing differences and similarities among cultures and countries can promote understanding and tolerance for others.

Not only does this week promote diversity but also the variety of individual students on this campus. There are 94 nations represented at K-State, and nearly 900 international students will showcase their cultures.

Take advantage of different international movies shown in Forum Hall free all week. The ability to see the people, land and customs of another country through the medium of motion pictures is a powerful experience.

The international students add something important to the campus environment, and taking the time to understand their talents, beliefs and experiences can be a great realistic education.

Advice that will make your life at K-State safer, easier to handle

It's time to clear a few things up on and around campus that will make life a lot safer and easier for all of us. Most of the problems are related to our bustling transportation, but one is of a more aromatically offensive nature.

I'm not sure why I even have to mention this, and I hope the problem is restricted to the males on campus, but for legal reasons I can only hope it is. Apparently I'm not the only one who's noticed, because there are signs posted in the Military Science Building and Throckmorton and Denison halls bathrooms that say, "Please flush after use."

VIEWPOINT

JASON RUCKER

Jason is a senior in animal science. You can send e-mail to Jason at anubis@ksu.edu.

Unfortunately, the signs are not unwarranted. I can only guess that the propensity to leave one's bodily waste for the enjoyment of others has to do with the fact that spring is the onset of mating season for many animals. Let me take this moment to assure the guilty parties that the likelihood of a female in season entering the men's room is not good.

I'm really beginning to wonder if there are guys on this campus who were just trained to wear pants and taught not to lick themselves in public. You would think people of this mental level would be the most likely to flush, as they are often distracted by shiny things, but apparently not. Most of us are rural folks, and I realize hedge rows do not have flush handles, but toilets do, so use 'em!

Now that our noses are safe, on to our streets and sidewalks. As it gets warmer, bike traffic will be picking up. In the past there has been a lot of friction between bike riders and pedestrians, so let's nip it in the bud.

To start with, "sidewalk," is a compound word meaning a walk for pedestrians at the side of the street. Bikers ride in the street, unless they're on a bike path or directly on their way to a bike rack. Pedestrians, walk on the sidewalk, not on bike paths or in the street. Bike paths are designated for bike traffic. If you choose to walk on bike paths, don't give those of us riding through those nasty looks as we buzz past you sending you scurrying for cover. That should clear up any confusion for those of you who seem to have missed the compound words lecture in the first grade.

Yet another new concept in our transportation safety discussion, the turn signal. I want everybody to take this column out to your car as soon as you can and sit behind the wheel. Do you see that stick-like protrusion coming out of your steering column on the left side at roughly a 20-degree angle? It's a magic stick.

When you push it up or down, it sends a message to other drivers and pedestrians that tells them which way you would like to turn. It can even be used to alert others of your intention to change lanes. Up for right, and down for left. Now that you have been shown the way, you must use it only for good.

While you're in your car, look around for yet another device. It might be on the dash, or at the end of the turn signal. When you turn it, your headlights come on (yet another compound word). These are for driving at night, to see, and make you visible to other night drivers. News flash.

You are not the Cyberdyne Systems Model 101 Terminator, you did not just steal a police car while breaking Sarah Connor out of a state hospital, and you do not have night vision. Turn on your lights.

The last subject for campus improvement has been brought up a few times — OK, daily. You might say I was flogging a dead horse to bring it up, but hey, I work in the necropsy lab.

Crosswalk safety is not only a subject of lighting and driver safety, but of common sense on the part of the pedestrian.

I say this as no slight to those involved in accidents. But people, you can't cross the streets in the middle of the night dressed in all black. In my first three years here, I was convinced there was a clan of suicidal ninjas living just east of campus along Manhattan Avenue.

If you're decked out in your black sweat pants and your Raiders jacket at 10 p.m., you can't just step in front of a car traveling at 30 mph and expect them to see you in time to stop. Not to mention with the abundance of Chiefs fans around here, they might hit you anyway.

So gallivant, cavort, frolic and revel in the glory of spring, but for everyone's sake, please flush, ride in the street, walk on the sidewalk, signal, turn on your headlights and watch yourself, as well as brighten up your wardrobe, when crossing the streets at night.

BILL KRAAI/Collegian

"CROSSWALK SAFETY IS NOT ONLY A SUBJECT OF LIGHTING AND DRIVER SAFETY, BUT OF COMMON SENSE ON THE PART OF THE PEDESTRIAN."

Crime, punishment has lost all meaning

The laws in this country confuse me beyond belief. There seems to be so many loopholes offenders might slip through, and the continued construction of more prisons, jails and courthouses seems only to add to the bureaucratic system that ties up billions of the taxpayer's dollars. For all this added red tape, little or sometimes no results are seen.

Crime and punishment has lost all meaning. I do not understand how prisoners can be convicted, sentenced and then have more rights than before. Repeat offenders might be caught red-handed and linked to the scene of the crime that landed them a one-way ticket to the big house, but only be required to pay a minimum price for their transgression against society.

VIEWPOINT

SANTOS RAMIREZ

Santos is a senior in criminal justice. You can send e-mail to Santos at lpdline@ksu.edu.

I am a firm believer that laws were created to maintain peace and order. Everyone should know this.

However, the criminal justice system is sending mixed messages. Many laws seem to protect those who victimize as well as victims.

I don't understand how a criminal can be given the death penalty and not have the sentence carried out. Some will argue this is a viable punishment because offenders now have their entire life to sit in prison and think about what they did. However, the convicted criminals rarely, if ever, care about what they did.

The death penalty is rarely enforced in America. Therefore, ideology dictates that crime and punishment rarely go hand in hand. This reinforces my belief that sometimes our court systems fail us, the law-abiding citizens, by protecting those who break laws.

For example, it seems that whenever criminals who are sentenced to death are executed, they have been on death row for 10 to 20 years, if not longer. What is the value of a court system that imposes punishments that are slow to be enacted? Why allow criminals a reduced sentence for good behavior? Once a punishment is set, it should stay set.

Should criminals have rights? Should we, the taxpayers, provide convicts with free education, multi-million dollar facilities and more luxuries than some of us have?

I'm not saying criminals should be treated like animals, but they shouldn't be given some things for free.

I'm outraged some inmates are allowed to earn income while serving time. Although it is a meager wage, it is money nonetheless. They should be serving time, not given a place of employment or bonuses for good behavior.

Yeah, inmates are really making a "big" sacrifice.

It seems criminals are better off in prison where they are fed, given shelter and, for some, a free education. Is it fair that inmates continue their "easy" time while we're paying for it?

Wefald criticized for closing e-mail

Editor,

The Collegian is correct to lament President Jon Wefald's decision to deactivate his e-mail account. The Kansas Board of Regents has elevated multimedia technologies to one of the system's five strategic missions. Faculty and students who have questioned the sometimes uncritical attitude of administrators about the benefits of technology in higher education would be justified in noting an inconsistency here.

Many of us would no doubt like to take the easy way out and just turn the dang thing off instead of dealing with it, like all communications media, as having evils that necessitate care and selectivity in its management.

But the fact is that e-mail has become absolutely critical to the functioning of this institution.

Perhaps more unfortunate is Wefald's misperceptions about the nature of this medium, especially his belief, if the Collegian is accurately quoting him, that e-mail messages are usually careless in composition and content.

He is a historian (bless his soul) and historians are among the most prolific users of e-mail on the Internet. More than 60,000 of them communicate regularly through almost 100 international scholarly e-mail discussion lists located at H-Net: Humanities & Social Sciences Online at Michigan State University (including several hundred scholars in Wefald's field of expertise). Meanwhile, college administrators around the country rely on numerous e-mail lists to keep up with their fields and establish new contacts.

At the end of the day, Wefald has turned off his access to a remarkable world where students and colleagues spend much time and effort sharing creative scholarship and informed opinion. I hope he will reconsider his decision.

Lights to be added at 10 campus sites

Editor,

I am writing to thank the Collegian and concerned students for showing an interest in crosswalk safety at K-State. Because of your concern, something is now being done about adequate lighting at many crosswalks throughout campus. Unfortunately, it took an accident to make people realize this problem. I am glad students here care enough about the university to show concern and work to make things better.

I recently learned that in 1999, $30,000 will be spent to add lights at 10 different sites around campus. With the addition of these lights, drivers will soon be able to see pedestrians crossing the busy streets —preventing accidents like the one that occurred earlier this semester.

Clinton says dismissal helps U.S.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton said that if he were an average citizen, "Joe Six-Pack," he might regret not getting his day in court against Paula Jones. But as president, he said he's glad the case was dismissed and he can get on with his job.

Americans are telling pollsters they want the independent counsel's investigation of the president to end as well.

With a federal court decision last week to dismiss Jones' sexual harassment lawsuit against the president, friends of the president said on Sunday that the time is right for Clinton to speak out on the other sensational case against him: allegations of a sexual relationship with former intern Monica Lewinsky and of urging her to lie about it.

Clinton, in an interview with Time, said the end of the Jones case helps not only him but the United States.

"If I were just a private citizen, Joe Six-Pack, I would have mixed feelings about not getting a chance to disprove these allegations in court," Clinton told Time. But he added, "I don't have mixed feelings as president, because having the case dismissed and putting this behind us is plainly in the best interest of the country."

Clinton again denied Jones' charges that as Arkansas governor in 1991 he made unwanted sexual advances in a Little Rock hotel room.

Asked about the Supreme Court decision to let the civil case against a sitting president proceed, Clinton said he has done his best to live up to the court's opinion that the lawsuit would not affect his job.

The challenge was to keep his personal problems and his official duties separate. "It's been a test," he said, "but I've tried to do that."

He said the case also confirmed historical anxieties that such a case would have an overwhelming political aspect to it.

U.S. District Judge Susan Webber Wright, who dismissed the case, told Newsweek, "I don't feel like my decision was courageous. I'm sworn to follow the law, and I tried to do that. I just want to go back to being a regular judge."

The president's aides said that with the dramatic turn in the Jones case, Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr should wrap up his investigation so the White House and Congress can concentrate on what's important for the country.

"The American people want less, not more," adviser Rahm Emanuel, on NBC's "Meet the Press," said of the investigations.

"We have important business to do as well, the president does have a day job, and it's running the only superpower on God's earth," said another adviser, Paul Begala, on ABC's "This Week with Sam Donaldson and Cokie Roberts."

Republicans also have expressed hope that Starr finish his work quickly so they can decide if the House must move forward on impeachment proceedings, but they blame the White House for the delays.

On "Fox News Sunday," House Majority Whip Tom DeLay, R-Texas, said, "I do believe, after looking at all that's going on, that this president could very well be a sexual predator. And he has committed some heinous acts."

Dow surges above 9,000 despite Asian troubles

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — The Dow Jones industrial average surged above 9,000 for the first time Friday. Although the Dow fell just short of the milestone at the close, it marked a stunning comeback for a market barometer many were about to write off after a historic stumble just 5 months ago.

The Dow rose as high as 9,030.49 in early trading but finished Friday with a 3.23-point drop at 8,983.41. Trading was heavy and broad market indexes rose to new highs, with the Nasdaq Stock Market and the Standard & Poor's 500 list among those adding to the record finishes.

"I sit back in awe at the sheer power that this market has," said Russ Labrasca, senior vice president at State Street Research in Boston. "We've come very far, very fast, and that's because of the almost perfect balance between inflation, interest rates and earnings."

It wasn't long ago the outlook for the stock market was grim. The Asian financial crisis sent the Dow plunging 554 points on Oct. 27, 1997, its biggest one-day point drop ever. Many market watchers thought the end of the bull market had come.

The market has been a wild ride as it climbed back from its depressed levels, and few expected 1998 to be another record-setting year. The Dow already had climbed more than 20 percent for 3 consecutive years, and fallout from Asia was expected to subdue the party.

But after a shaky start in early January, the stock market's pace has hardly slowed this year. Concerns about the effect of Asia's troubles have waned in recent months and, while the U.S. economy remains strong, investors remain confident inflationary pressures aren't on the rise.

The latest evidence of a cooling-off of inflation came Friday with the Labor Department's report that the nation's unemployment rate inched up to 4.7 percent from February's 24-year-low of 4.6 percent.

"We are back to an economy that is still perking along and not overheating," said Steven Goldman, market strategist at Weeden & Co. in Greenwich, Conn. "This long economic recovery is rare, but all the ingredients remain in place for a healthy market."

The Dow, which is comprised of 30 blue-chip companies and is the oldest and most widely followed Wall Street indicator, has climbed nearly 14 percent this year and has doubled in less than three years.

The rise toward 9,000 comes eight months after the Dow first closed above 8,000 on July 16, 1997. The blue-chip index fell below 7,000 in late October before staging its comeback.

Helping propel the Dow higher has been a steady stream of money into stocks from managers of mutual funds, such as retirement accounts.

In addition, international investors, especially those in Asia, have looked to U.S. financial markets for growth opportunities.

"Cash is like a hot potato — no one wants to hold on to it too long," said Alan Ackerman, senior vice president at Fahnestock & Co. "No one wants to be caught on the sidelines while the market keeps rising."

Pippen says he won't return to Chicago Bulls next season

HOUSTON — Scottie Pippen added more fuel to the Bulls breakup speculation Sunday, saying he won't accept a one-year contract and doesn't expect to be back next season — even if team management changes.

Pippen was asked what he would do if owner Jerry Reinsdorf offered one-year contracts to all the team's free agents.

"I think it's time for me to move on. If he wants to insult me and offer me a one-year deal, he can go to hell," Pippen said before the Bulls beat the Rockets 109-94 for their 12th-straight win.

An unconfirmed Chicago gossip column report last week said Reinsdorf is prepared to bring back all the free agents — including Michael Jordan, Dennis Rodman, Pippen, Luc Longley, Steve Kerr and Coach Phil Jackson — for one more year if the Bulls win a sixth title.

Jordan, Rodman and Jackson are on one-year deals. Pippen, in his 11th season, will be a free-agent after this year.

He is making $2.7 million this season under a contract extension signed in 1991 and has been unhappy with his salary and with general manager Jerry Krause.

"Nothing is carved in stone, but I'm looking to go elsewhere," Pippen said. "It's time for me to move on. ...Right now I'm not looking to come back here."

The Rockets are expected to be at least $10 million under the salary cap, and speculation has been ripe in Houston that the team will make a bid for Pippen in the free agent market.

"It would be great for me, because it would be the first time I would have played with a dominating big man," Pippen said after Sunday's game.

"I like Hakeem a lot, and I have a lot of respect for him as a person. I really admire his game and the way he plays.

"It would be great to have the eopportunity to play with a guy like Hakeem."

Pippen missed the first 35 games this season following foot surgery. In November, he threatened to never play for the Bulls again and said he wanted to be traded.

After returning to the team, he softened his stance.

Pippen's return might or might not be linked to Jordan's future. Jordan has repeatedly said he won't come back if Jackson doesn't.

Green Bay deals Bono to Rams for late-round draft pick in '99

ST. LOUIS — The St. Louis Rams have acquired backup quarterback Steve Bono from the Green Bay Packers for a late-round draft pick in 1999.

The move comes only days after Mark Rypien, the Rams' backup last season, signed a two-year deal with the Atlanta Falcons.

Coach Dick Vermeil said Bono would compete with Will Furrer, the third-stringer last year, for the backup job behind Tony Banks.

"Hey, Tony is our starting quarterback," Vermeil said. "It's the same thing I was telling Mark Rypien, that the backup job was going to be open for competition."

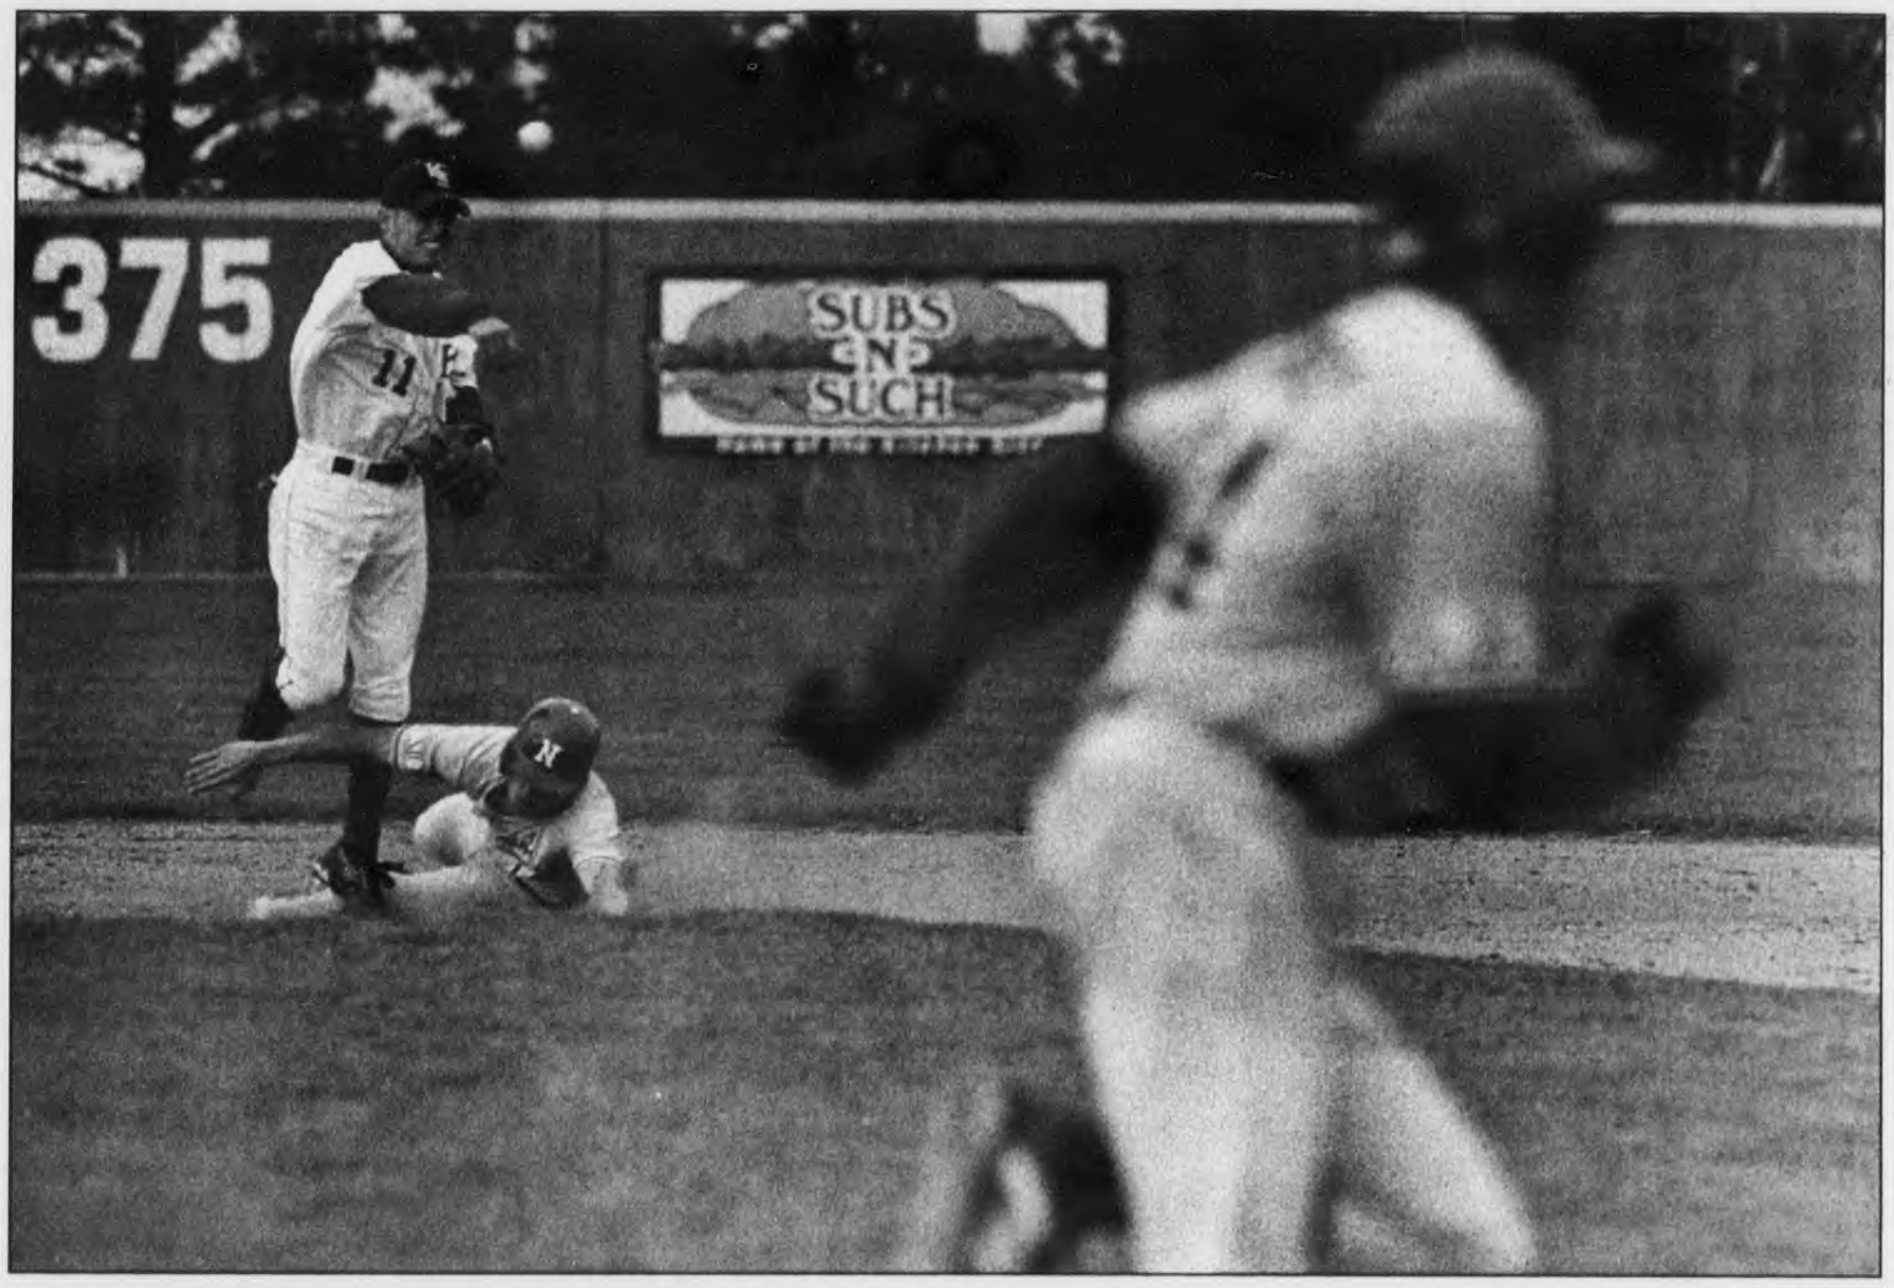
Bono, 35, signed with the Packers as a free agent last year and has one year left on a two-year $1.4 million contract. He played in only two games last year behind Brett Favre, completing five of 10 passes for 29 yards.

Bono is 28-12 as an NFL starter and also has played for Minnesota, Pittsburgh, San Francisco and Kansas City.

In 80 NFL games, Bono has produced seven fourth-quarter comebacks and has five 300-yard passing games.

His best season was with Kansas City in 1995, when he threw for 3,121 yards and 21 touchdowns in leading the Chiefs to a 13-3 record and AFC West title.

But he threw three interceptions in the Chiefs' stunning 10-7 loss to Indianapolis that knocked the Chiefs out of the playoffs in a year in which most observers thought they had their best chance in years to reach the Super Bowl.



Bono lost his starting job to Rich Gannon late in the following season, but was back for the last game of the season after Gannon pulled his hamstring. The Chiefs needed to win at Buffalo to make the playoffs, but Bono threw two interceptions and was ineffective and Kansas City was out of the playoffs for the first time since 1989.

The Chiefs signed Elvis Grbac in March 1997 and put Bono on waivers in June. Coach Marty Schottenheimer at the time referred to the Chiefs acquisition of Bono from the San Francisco 49ers in 1994 as "an error."

He backed up Joe Montana that year and became the starter upon Montana's retirement.

Bono almost immediately fell into disfavor with Chiefs fans when he declined to participate fully in the team's off-season workouts, choosing to remain in San Francisco and work out on his own.

He further alienated fans when he was critical of Kansas City restaurants in widely publicized remarks.

NEBRASKA BASERUNNER ERIK MUMM SLIDES INTO SECOND BASEMAN CHAD TABOR, AS TABOR TURNS A DOUBLE PLAY TO THROW OUT BRYAN SCHMIDT, FOREGROUND, ON SATURDAY AT FRANK MYERS FIELD.

The K-State baseball team battled Nebraska in a three game set on Saturday and Sunday. The two squads split the first of a twinbill on Saturday, but the Cats came back and took the third game of the series 11-9 and

Shucked the Huskers

JEREMY KELLEY
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State baseball team beat Nebraska 11-9 on Sunday, but the score shouldn't have been that close.

The Cats went into the top of the ninth inning leading 11-3 and appeared to have the game locked, but the Cornhuskers stormed back and tallied six runs before Andy Silva came on and saved the game for the Cats.

"We knew they were going to play all 27 outs, and we had to compete and play all 27 outs with them," K-State coach Mike Clark said. "It's unfortunate that we didn't get out of there with an 11-6 win, but maybe we'll learn a lesson from this."

Furthermore, Sunday's win was K-State's second win of the series and improved the overall record to 13-16, 5-8 in the Big 12, while Nebraska dropped to 13-12, 1-5 in the conference.

On Sunday, the Huskers tallied two runs in the first to take a quick lead, but K-State stormed back and put up two runs in the fourth and never looked back.

Catcher Chet Savage hit a dinger to left field in the fourth inning — a two-run shot that scored left fielder Quinn Cravens. Savage went two-for-five and had three RBIs.

"We got the bats going early today," Clark said. "It was a great game and a conference win."

The Cats added three more in the fifth inning. Second baseman Chad Tabor led off with a walk and later advanced to second on a groundout. Designated hitter Yancy Ayres singled to left and scored Tabor. Third baseman Josh Marn walked and advanced to second on Brian Bobier's single to left, which scored Ayres. Savage ended the rally with a single to center field, and Marn scored.

The Cats added one more in the sixth and four more in the seventh inning to cushion their lead.

Pitcher Mickey Blount picked up his second win of the year, pitching four solid innings of ball and fanning five batters along the way. It was just Blount's third appearance on the season.

"We're trying to get his pitch count up," K-State pitching coach Mike Hensley said. "He's behind everyone right now as far as pitch count, and today he went a long ways in trying to etch that up there."

On Saturday, the two teams split a doubleheader. The Cats won the first of the twinbill 6-5 and lost the latter in the 10 innings 4-3.

In the first game, Marn hit a two-run homer in the third inning, his sixth on the year, and the Cats were up early, 4-0. The Huskers rallied back in the seventh and tied the game at five. The Cats scored the winning run in the bottom of the eighth on a Jay Sirianni balk that allowed Ayres to score.

Center fielder Eric Sommerhauser led the Cats in the win, going 4-5. Brandon Peck started for the Wildcats and pitched six innings. Peck allowed five runs on nine hits and struck out one batter. Tim Johnson came on in the sixth to pick up the win, his first on the season.

In the second contest, the Cats were out manned by one Husker — first baseman Ken Harvey. Harvey walloped the Cats single-handed going 3-5 with a pair of home runs and three RBIs. It was Harvey's monster shot in the top of the 10th that gave the Huskers the win.

Clark said he was pleased with the weekend and said he thought his team was playing good baseball.

"We have to stay focused on playing good baseball. That's a big concern for us," he said. "We have to keep competing the way we have been competing so we can get into the tournament."

The Cats are back in action on Wednesday, where they will face Kansas in a non-conference game in Lawrence.

Renetta Seiler named Trackwire's Athlete of the Week

SAM FELSENFELD
Kansas State Collegian

Although K-State's Renetta Seiler captured three gold medals at Thursday's Emporia State University Open, it was not her highlight of the past week.

On Friday, Seiler, a thrower for the Wildcats' track team, was named Trackwire's Women's Athlete of the Week. The honor was a result of her huge toss of 207-6 in the hammer throw on March 28 at the University of Texas-El Paso Springtime Invitational.

"I know it's a really big honor," Seiler said. "Being on Trackwire is something that I really appreciate because the field events aren't always a focal point. This honor is a way of showing who's doing well."

Seiler said it was a good sign when she threw farther than the previous week's Athlete of the Week, Windy Dean of Southern Methodist University.

"Windy Dean was Trackwire's athlete of the week last week with a throw of 207 feet, so when I hit my 207-6, I knew it was a big throw," Seiler said.

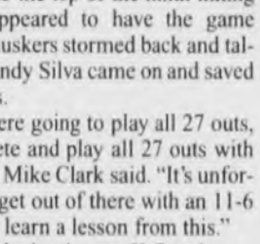
Seiler's throw earned her the Trackwire honor and lifted her to third place on the all-time collegiate list.

At Thursday's ESU Open, Seiler brought home the gold in the hammer, discus, and shot put with throws of 202-4, 151 and 44-6 1/4 inches respectively. She automatically qualified for the NCAA Championships in the hammer.

"I had an OK day at Emporia," Seiler said. "My timing was a little off in the discus and shot, but for a working-through meet, it was pretty good.

"We like to train through all the meets in the season so we can peak at the Big 12 and NCAA meets."

Also claiming gold medals at the ESU Open were freshmen Amanda Crouse and Joy Gertsch.



Crouse was a double winner, with a victory in the 1,500 meter with a time of 4:39.79 and one in the 800 meter with 2:17.78.

Gertsch negotiated 5 feet 6 inches in the high jump to take the gold.

Paul Birnbaum was the lone winner for the Wildcat men at the ESU Open with a victory in the 5,000-meter run with a time of 14:41.13.

NFL draft inspires dreams for AFC success after recent failures

VIEWPOINT

Jess is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Jess at jess31@ksu.edu.

Hey everybody, Major League Baseball began its season last week.

Yawn.

Al-righty then, now that our in-depth discussion of baseball is out of the way, we can discuss a sport someone in this country still follows — football.

The NFL's annual draft will be April 18 and 19. That means some of our favorite AFC teams will pick some busts and superstars.

Does Kansas City's brilliant drafting of Trezelle Jenkins or the "Done Deal" Greg Hill ring a bell? Both were first-round draft flops that are no longer collecting paychecks from the Chiefs.

However, before the Chiefs picked the terrible twosome, they picked up Neil Smith and Derrick Thomas in 1988 and 1989. But then they followed those brilliant picks with Percy Snow. That guy should have stayed off mopeds.

But the Chiefs aren't the only AFC West team to pick some floppers.

How about the Broncos' brilliant draft acquisition of Tommy Maddox in 1992? Do all of you Donkey fans still remember Maddox? You know, the guy out of UCLA with an arm similar to John Elway's? Unfortunately for Maddox, he proved he had the throwing accuracy of an 80-pound crack addict.

The Broncos and Chiefs might have had some draft-day mistakes in the past, but they have been able to redeem themselves in other years and later rounds.

Unlike the Seattle Seahawks.

The good for the Seahawks is that they picked up defensive back Shawn Springs from Ohio State last year, and in the 1995 draft they picked up Joey Galloway, one of the league's best receivers. But that's about it.

The Seahawks still need a quarterback — 41-year-old Warren Moon can't last an entire season.

In fact, they've needed a quarterback since the franchise began playing. No, David Kreig wasn't a playoff-caliber quarterback.

Take a look at the quarterbacks the Seahawks have drafted in the '80s and '90s. It's pretty comical.

In 1993, the Seahawks spent their No. 1 pick on Rick Mirer. Mirer proved in college he wasn't going to become a decent NFL quarterback. He had a great arm, but no confidence and feet happier than John Travolta's in "Saturday Night Fever."

But wait, it gets better. In 1988 they took ... drum roll please ... Brian Bosworth, joke linebacker out of Sooner Land.

Bosworth was probably the biggest disappointment since ... well, ever.

We all recall Bosworth getting blasted by Bo Jackson in that Monday night game. After the game, Bosworth still had cleat marks across his forehead.

In fact, I think it was the cleat marks that led Bosworth to pursue a career as a bad actor.

It would sometimes seem Raiders' owner and president Al Davis is taking some very strong medication on recent draft days. Although I must give props where props are due, Davis can be a very shrewd judge of talent.

In 1973, Davis used a No. 1 draft pick to snag the NFL's greatest punter of all time, Ray Guy. In 1987, he used a seventh-round pick to take some guy by the name of Bo Jackson. And in 1988, Davis picked up Heisman Trophy winner Tim Brown out of Notre Dame.

Do either of those two names ring a bell?

But recent drafts just haven't gone the way Davis expected. In 1991, Davis selected Todd Marinovich out of USC. Perhaps the only thing Marinovich had going for him was, well, nothing. After three seasons, Marinovich vanished from the league.

Last year, the Raiders traded up for defensive lineman Darrell Russell. He might be big, strong and fast, but he didn't make much of an impression in his rookie campaign.

But it's a bit difficult to make an difference when your team is 4-12, so it's still too early to tell if the USC product will become a force in the league.

By the way Wildcat fans, Pro Football Weekly ranked former K-State offensive tackle Todd Weiner as the 77th best player overall in this year's draft.

Good luck, Todd. All us Wildcat fans enjoyed watching you play.

UPC loses money showing blockbuster films

STORY BY TODD PACEY

"Titanic" has grossed more than $500 million, yet people still routinely pay their $5 to see the film. However, movies are not always shown just to make the big bucks.

The Union Program Council actually loses money when they show films at the Union Little Theatre. Heide McBride, UPC program adviser, said the films give students something fun and inexpensive to do.

UPC Films shows two types of films. Feature films are films normally found at mainstream theaters. Kaleidoscope films are older and might be cult classics.

"For the feature films, we usually have about 200 to 250 students attend the four shows. Kaleidoscope attendance is smaller at around 75 to 100 students," McBride said.

UPC does not receive enough money to cover the cost of the film by charging the $1 or $1.75 admission. McBride said the feature films cost between $450 and $800, while the Kaleidoscope films cost $150 to $300.

UPC receives between $4,000 to $5,000 from student fees and also gets financial support from the K-State Student Union as well, McBride said. The UPC Films Committee then decides which movies are to be shown based on the budget.

McBride said UPC probably will offer fewer feature films in the future because it is losing money on them. She said UPC probably will try to offer one blockbuster a month and have more Kaleidoscope films.

Diversity is key in the selection process, McBride said. Films are chosen to coincide with Black History Month in February and other national observances, but local events do not dictate the film schedule, unless an organization asks to co-sponsor a film, she said.

"Last semester, we were showing 'Rosewood' and there was a speaker on campus talking about Rosewood, but that was just a coincidence," McBride said.

Michael Sloane, sophomore in chemistry and fan of UPC films, said he likes the variety and the prices but said publicity is lacking.

"Last semester I would tell my friends 'Ninja Scroll' was playing at the Union and they would be like 'What? Where?' They have a lot of great movies, but a lot of people miss them because they don't know about it," Sloane said.

Students interested in the schedule of movies should stop by the UPC office on the third floor of the Union. McBride also said students could request films or be a part of the selection process by attending the films committee meetings in the UPC office at 8:30 p.m. Thursdays for Kaleidoscope or at 8:30 p.m. Mondays for Feature Films.

"GOD MAY LOVE YOU BUT, HE WON'T RESPECT YOU IN THE MORNING."

Department head to step down after decade of service

JOHN FRANSON
Kansas State Collegian

After more than a decade, the head of the Department of Music, Jack Flouer, is ready to let someone else take the wheel.

"I felt I had been doing it long enough," he said.

Flouer will continue to teach and research full time.

To find a new leader, the department decided to repeat what it did 30 years ago and expanded its search beyond the confines of McCain Auditorium. A national search was commissioned by the College of Arts and Sciences to hire a new department head, one with a new outlook and a fresh set of ideas.

"A new head comes with a fresh perspective," Mary Ellen Sutton, professor of music, said. "I know that we have qualified people in our department who could be head. But there are times when it's important to bring in new blood and new faculty."

Sutton is part of a search committee, comprosed mainly of music faculty, responsible for screening materials from applicants across the nation aspiring for the position. The committee will choose as many as five qualified candidates from a pool that Larry Rodgers, committee chair and head of the Department of English, said he estimated at roughly 50. The dean of the arts and sciences college will make the final choice from that group.

"The process, we hope, is nearing an end," Rodgers said. "Certainly by the end of the spring semester we hope that it's wrapped up."

When a committee is searching for a new department head, it is common for another department head to act as chair of the committee, Rodgers said.

"What department heads do, in some cases, has more commonality with other department heads than with members of the faculty," he said.

The search has been typical of its kind, Rodgers said.

"You start out by trying to attract as large a pool of applicants from all over the country as possible, with as distinguished credentials as possible," he said.

The next step is to look for certain qualifications, including strong teaching credentials, a substantial national reputation in the areas of performance and research, and people who have a kind of visionary administrative ability that can immediately foster the trust of the faculty members they represent, Rodgers said.

Although K-State's music program might not be as well-known as some others, it nevertheless should be attractive to a distinguished applicant, Rodgers said.

"I think that the music department here has some incredible strengths, some extraordinary untapped potential, and is much stronger to those applicants who are looking at it than a casual assessment might suggest," he said.

Rodgers said the position is a great opportunity for whomever fills it.

"This is a department that's hungry to welcome a new department head into its ranks and to respond to the kind of innovative ideas that new department heads typically can bring to a group of people," he said.

Sutton said she had similar ideas about what a new head could mean to the music faculty.

"The main thing is to lead, and to be an idea person, and to be a good scholar, performer and musician," she said. "The head can furnish the tone of what happens with the whole department, and stimulates faculty to try new things."

As to what Flouer considered the most important quality for a new department head to possess, he offered two simple words.

"People skills," he said. "Dealing with people — students and faculty."

Manhattan 6th grader earns top honor in music contest

▶VOCAL PERFORMANCE PLACES STUDENT AMONG 24 WINNERS FROM ACROSS UNITED STATES.

ALECIA TERRELL

The next Ella Fitzgerald might be found right here in Manhattan.

Sindhuja Krishnamoorthi, a sixth grader from Frank Bergman Elementary School, was one of 24 students picked from across the nation as a winner of the Music Educators National Conference.

"I was really excited when I found out I had actually won, because I didn't really think I had a chance," Krishnamoorthi said.

Elementary- through university-level students were selected from four categories: piano, solo (instrumental or vocal), small ensemble (instrumental or vocal) and large ensemble (choral or orchestral).

Krishnamoorthi was a winner in the vocal solo competition.

MENC's Student Composition Contest exists to recognize talented young music students across America. The applicants' musical creations are showcased to professional music educators.

John Richard, Krishnamoorthi's vocal teacher, said he came across the idea while reading a MENC magazine.

"I'm a member of MENC, and after I saw the article, Sindhuja came to mind because she always does so well on the ones in town. I took the idea to Krishnamoorthi and asked if she might be interested in entering the contest. I talked it over with her parents, and they decided that she should enter," he said.

Richard said the applicants have to be piggybacked with a member of MENC.

"I had heard that she was one of the top-24 in the nation and that the winners were asked to come play in the conference in April," he said. "From what I understand, a lot of the winners, including Sindhuja, were unable to attend."

Richard said he liked the idea that there were no first- and second-place awards, but that everyone was a winner.

"It's great to win second place, but the winners always feel bad," Richard said.

MENC selects compositions that are the best representative works from its six divisions — Eastern, North Central, Northwest, Southern, Southwestern and Western. Applicants submit their original score and accompanying audio recording of the work, not to exceed five minutes, along with their résumé and written application form for review by a national committee.

Krishnamoorthi was one of three students selected from the Southwestern Division-the other two are high school seniors.

She selected a piano composition as her musical work.

"Sindhuja is really a talented student," Richard said.

Not only has she played the piano for the last 4 years, but Krishnamoorthi has played the violin since she was 3.

"I thought my piano composition was more complicated, so that's why I submitted it into this competition," she said.

Krishnamoorthi said along with Richard, her piano teacher, Jean Kitchen, was also quite supportive.

"When I first made my composition, I really couldn't get it written down the way I wanted, and she helped me place my notes where I needed them," she said.

Krishnamoorthi said she started the composition in the summer because she knew it had to be submitted by February. Her composition was 2 pages long.

"I put a lot of repeat signs in my work," she said.

Unlike some music students, Krishnamoorthi said she likes to practice.

"Most of the time it depends on the songs I am playing, whether they are fun or more complicated," she said.

Krishnamoorthi said she can see herself playing musical instruments as a career until she is older.

"It's not something I would probably go around doing because you have to be really good to do that," she said.

Richard said Krishnamoorthi tends to sell herself a little short.

While playing piano and violin would seem to take up a lot of one's time, Krishnamoorthi is also involved in tap dance, has been in several community and school performances, and is a member of the Gold Orchestra, led by David Littrell.

"I am truly blessed with Sindhuja's presence," Richard said. "She has always had a great attitude about everything and, most importantly, she gets her work done."

Mecca sight of pilgrimage, drawing more than 2 million

Saudi Arabia takes pride in providing for the pilgrims as a way to increase its stature among the world's 1.1 billion Muslims.

Caterers will provide meals for the pilgrims, and — to cope with temperatures expected above 100 degrees — authorities have provided water coolers around Mecca and planned to distribute millions of water bottles.

They have set up hospital beds and called in more than 10,000 doctors to attend to the sick. Dozens of first-aid workers will ride motorbikes to provide emergency help.

> "I HAD A DREAM BEFORE I CAME HERE THAT I WAS GOING FOR THE HAJJ AND NOW I'M HERE."
> HAJI ABDULLAH
> Muslim from Brunei

Saudi authorities also reportedly arrested 43 pickpockets from Yemen to prevent them from preying on pilgrims. The Okaz newspaper reported Sunday that the pickpockets were arrested over the past several days with $20,000 in stolen money, including currencies from Iran, Germany, Indonesia, Nigeria, Syria, Egypt, Oman and Saudi Arabia.

Tens of thousands of police were mobilized to provide security and keep up with the snarled traffic moving toward Mecca from the rest of Saudi Arabia. Civil defense teams and Saudi Boy Scouts helped the elderly and lost make their way through the crowds.

But with huge crowds, tragedies have occurred.

In 1994, 270 pilgrims, mostly Indonesians, were killed as worshipers surged toward a cavern for the symbolic ritual of stoning the devil.

A stampede in an overcrowded pedestrian tunnel leading to holy sites killed 1,426 pilgrims in 1990.

And in 1987, 402 people, mostly Iranians, were killed and 649 were wounded when Saudi security forces clashed with Iranians having anti-U.S. demonstrations.

Officials have attributed part of this year's crowd to milder temperatures than in past years and improved relations between Saudi Arabia and Iran.

About 80,000 Iranians are performing the hajj. In one sign of improving ties, Iran's Interior Minister Abdollah Nouri met with Saudi Arabia's King Fahd on Saturday, the Al-Riyadh newspaper reported Sunday.

Nouri relayed thanks from Iranian President Mohammad Khatami for help extended to Iranian pilgrims, according to an Iranian source who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Khatami, a moderate, has called on the pilgrims to tone down their political protests. But hard-line clerics said such protests are an integral part of the pilgrimage.

Iran's official Islamic Republic News Agency quoted witnesses in Mecca as saying that thousands of Muslims broke into chants of "Death to Israel" and "Death to America" in the Grand Mosque on Saturday night.

A Saudi official who requested anonymity denied any protests occurred.

Social Security top on Clinton's list in Kansas City

Carpenter, who relies on her monthly Social Security check to dent the costs of retirement home living, said she worries not for herself, but for the millions of future retirees who pay into the system now, with withering guarantees the money will be there later.

"It would be selfish of me not to want to keep it going then as it is now," said Carpenter, a resident of John Knox Village retirement community in suburban Kansas City. "After all, we all are our brother's keeper."

At Penn Valley Community College, where the town hall meeting will take place, 28-year-old student Debbie Draper said the focus should be less on fixing a bureaucratic system and more on urging younger Americans to save money and invest wisely.

Doing that could help avoid dependence on a system whose benefits might be weakened over time, Draper said.

"I don't want the government to invest my money for me," she said. "I want the government out of my life as much as possible, and I don't think people realize that if they start putting small amounts away, it can really grow and maybe they won't have to worry so much about Social Security."

Civil rights march commemorates King's assassination prison.

Jackson, addressing a rally at the end of the commemorative march, urged listeners to ask themselves what King would be doing now if he were alive.

"His focus was not merely black and white," he said. "It was wrong and right."

King would be fighting still, he said, for better health care and economic equality and for renewal rather than revenge.

The day's events wrapped up with an evening prayer vigil at the National Civil Rights Museum, where 300 people stood in a courtyard in front of the balcony where King died, holding up small flashlights shaped like candles.

In Atlanta, about 300 people gathered at King's tomb. Two wreaths were laid at the foot of the tomb at the Martin Luther King Jr. Center for Nonviolent Social Change.

Among those present was 16-year-old Chafee Owens, a member of a Chattanooga, Tenn., Girl Scout troop.

"Martin Luther King was a very strong person who uplifted a whole bunch of spirits," she said. "If we would have listened to him, this would be a better place."

In New York, civil rights, labor and community activists led thousands on a march to Times Square.

"We give thanks for this warrior of justice," said Jewelnel Davis, the Columbia University chaplain who began the march with a prayer. "Today we call out for strength and shout out for courage — hate will not live."

SEAL OF APPROVAL

Colbert Hills receives support of planning board; City Commision to decide on annexation of land

JIM COLBERT
KSU ALUMNUS AND SENIOR PGA TOUR PLAYER

With positive backing from members of the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board, approval of the annexation of 315 acres to be used for the Colbert Hills golf course was forwarded last night to the Manhattan City Commission.

To begin construction of the 18-hole championship golf course, the proposal must be approved at the commission meeting on April 21.

The vote would include the go-ahead for construction of the course, which eventually will reside within the proposed Grand Mere Heights housing addition, and the permission to begin construction of model homes for the development.

If approved, golf-course construction would begin within a month of the vote.

"This is one of the most significant projects to come along in Manhattan's history," said Bruce Downing of the contracting firm Downing, Thorpe and James, who presented the annexation proposal to the planning board on Monday. "It is going to give people a chance to look at this community in a new light."

Board members expressed their support of Downing's hopes of the Colbert Hills and Grand Mere Heights construction, commenting on their desires to see the project get a running start.

Also anxious for the project to be under way is K-State Vice President of Institutional Advancement Bob Krause.

"The benefits to the college are four golden nuggets," Krause said. "They are the team use, the golf-course management degree program, the research of the course's effect on the protection of the environment and the youth academy that will be wrapped around the youth minority program Upward Bound for summer clinics."

Not only will campus activities be affected, but residents of the proposed housing development and any other interested golfers also will be able to use the daily fee course.

Football ticket distribution changes for 1998 season; student tickets rise to $98

JOHN STOUS
Kansas State Collegian

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics is changing the way students will purchase next year's season football tickets in August.

Students will be unable to put the charges on their fee payment, and they will no longer be allowed to reserve season tickets for both football and basketball at pre-enrollment.

What do we think? The Collegian editorial board is disappointed by the reasoning given for the student ticket increase. See Page 4.

Tickets also will be sold in Bramlage Coliseum instead of Ahearn Field House.

Students who purchase the combination ticket package will get preferential treatment because they are buying both football and basketball tickets. The combination package will be sold to all students from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. Aug. 28 in Bramlage.

"Any student is eligible to pick their tickets on Friday," said Carol Adolph, ticket manager for the athletic department.

On Aug. 29, football-only tickets will be sold from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. during preferential time increments based on seniority. The time slots will be determined by the percentage the class makes up of the total student population.

The combination ticket price has not been determined because next year's basketball schedule has not been set. The seven-game student season football ticket will cost $98, an increase of $4 per game.

Students also will be able to purchase ICAT tickets, which will cost an additional $30 in Bramlage before they leave.

The general public who had season tickets last year have received applications to renew their tickets for $197 and must have the applications in by May 15. Staff and faculty will pay $158, and their applications also must be in by May 15.

Adolph said the new way for students to purchase their tickets will be faster than in the past because the new K-State IDs are ready and can be swiped through a magnetic scanner to confirm the ticket customer is a student. She also said that by scanning the IDs, ticket sellers will be able to tell what class the student is.

Kent Brown, sports information director, said the new system would have as many pay stations as needed and should shorten the lines students have had to stand in.

Brown also said the air-conditioning in Bramlage should be a pleasant change for the students while waiting to purchase tickets, and having the parking lot right outside should be more convenient.

"We hope it is going to be convenient for the students," he said. "It is the one-stop shop. They can purchase the ticket and walk out with it in hand."

Brownback announces bid for re-election to U.S. Senate

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Sam Brownback formally announced on Monday what everyone already knew: He will seek Republican re-nomination and election this year to his first six-year term in the U.S. Senate.

He should know within three weeks whether Democratic state Sen. Paul Feleciano of Wichita will be his main challenger in his bid to claim a full term in the Senate seat previously occupied by Bob Dole.

Feleciano said he plans a trip to Washington, D.C., next week to try to finalize financial commitments from contributors, then announce before the Legislature begins its wrap-up session on April 29 — if he decides to seek the Democratic nomination.

Brownback made his official declaration at the foot of the south steps of the Statehouse.

He said four significant tasks remain to be accomplished: a smaller federal government, a new tax code, saving Social Security and "restoring our culture."

It is because of his dedication to those goals, Brownback said, that, "I seek your prayers and support and announce my candidacy for the United States Senate."

Brownback spoke to about 150 people assembled on the Statehouse steps and a cadre of politi-

Supreme Court grants counsel's request for expediation of travel office staff issue

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Whitewater prosecutors' attempt to get evidence they hope will clarify what role, if any, Hillary Rodham Clinton played in a purge of the White House travel office staff won expedited Supreme Court review Monday.

The justices granted Kenneth Starr's request for accelerated consideration of whether a lawyer who met with White House aide Vincent Foster shortly before Foster's 1993 suicide must surrender his notes of that meeting.

The case was put on a fast track expected to yield a decision by late June or early July. It will be argued before the nation's highest court June 8.

Starr wants the notes to help determine if presidential aides lied about whether Clinton had a role in the firing of the press travel office staff. She has said she had no role.

Lawyer James Hamilton took the three pages of notes on July 11, 1993, during a meeting with Foster about the investigation of the firings. Nine days later, Foster was found dead of what authorities say was a self-inflicted gunshot wound in a park outside Washington.

In other matters Monday, the court:

—Cleared the way for the tobacco industry's forced release of 39,000 secret documents in a trial in which Minnesota and an insurance company are seeking to recover $1.77 billion they say was spent to treat smoking-related illnesses.

—Let stand the drug-trafficking conviction and 40-year prison sentence of former Panamanian ruler Manuel Noriega.

—Refused to revive an antitrust lawsuit against Domino's Pizza Inc. by 11 franchise holders who accused it of monopolizing the $500-million-a-year market for pizza ingredients.

The court agreed to hear the attorney-client privilege dispute last month after Hamilton appealed lower court rulings that would require him to surrender his notes. He contends the privilege lives on even after the client dies.

Without expedited review, arguments would have been next fall and a decision likely delayed until 1999.

In urging a quicker review, Starr said the issues raised "need resolution so that a pending grand jury investigation … in a matter of substantial national interest can be completed in an expeditious manner."

15-member board chooses 'Ellen' series, '60 minutes' for 1997 Peabody awards

ATHENS, Ga. — The coming-out "Puppy Episode" of the ABC series "Ellen" earned a 1997 Peabody Award for broadcast and cable excellence.

The awards, administered by the University of Georgia's Henry W. Grady College of Journalism and Mass Communications, were announced March 31.

Among the 34 awards chosen from more than 1,300 entries were honors to the CBS News programs "Sunday Morning" and "60 Minutes" for ongoing excellence.

The recently canceled ABC series "Nothing Sacred" was cited by Peabody judges as providing an honest portrayal of the complexity of faith in the modern era. NBC's "Homicide: Life on the Street" received its third Peabody in five years.

Turner Broadcasting System founder Ted Turner and Chicago journalist Carol Marin received personal Peabody awards.

The judges called Turner a titanic figure in modern electronic communication. Marin, who quit her job to protest the hiring of talk-show host Jerry Springer as a commentator, was cited for her personal commitment to ethics and integrity in local broadcast journalism.

WGBH-TV in Boston received three awards — for the Masterpiece Theatre production of "The Tenant of Wildfell Hall," for "The American Experience: The Presidents Series" and "The American Experience: Troublesome Creek — a Midwestern."

The British Broadcasting Corp. was honored for its participation in "The Tenant of Wildfell Hall" and for what the judges called a surprisingly new and informative expose on the Third Reich, "The Nazis: A Warning from History."

Judging is done by a 15-member board that includes TV critics, broadcast and cable industry executives, and experts in culture and the arts.

Death of Milli Vanilli pop star lacks evidence that would indicate suicide

FRANKFURT, Germany — German authorities investigating the death of Rob Pilatus, half of the former pop duo Milli Vanilli, said Monday they had found no evidence of suicide.

Milli Vanilli's former producer, Frank Farian, said he suspected Pilatus died accidentally from a deadly combination of alcohol and prescription pills he was taking while in a drug-withdrawal program.

Pilatus, 33, was found dead Friday in a hotel room near Frankfurt.

On Thursday, he had showed up very intoxicated and shivering all over at Farian's studio, the producer said. Farian said he and his partner Ingrid Segieth became worried when Pilatus did not answer the phone Friday afternoon and asked the hotel to check the room.

Farian said Pilatus was scheduled to fly to Bombay, India, on Wednesday.

Frankfurt prosecutor Job Tilmann, citing preliminary autopsy results, said there was no sign of violence and no indication of suicide.

Chemical tests to determine whether alcohol or pills were involved were pending, he said.

Segieth said Pilatus had previously threatened to commit suicide in the United States, but notified the media beforehand so he could be found in time.

"He wanted to get attention," Segieth said.

Police spokesman Inolf Ruippert said a passport was found showing Pilatus was born in Munich, Germany, on June 8, 1964, but that there was no suicide note.

Pilatus is to be buried in Munich on Thursday.

He and his Milli Vanilli partner, Fabrice Morvan, won a 1989 Grammy for Best New Artist after hits like "Blame it on the Rain" and "All or Nothing."

In late 1990, the performers were stripped of the award when it was revealed that neither actually sang on Milli Vanilli records; the two unduly took credit for voice-overs by studio musicians.

The son of a U.S. soldier and a German mother, Pilatus worked as a model and dancer before joining Morvan in 1988 to form Milli Vanilli.

Drug might reduce risk of breast cancer

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The federal government has notified thousands of women of a breakthrough in the fight against cancer, saying a study for the first time shows a drug might prevent breast cancer.

The National Cancer Institute, the agency that coordinates the nation's cancer programs, said its six-year study showed that taking the drug tamoxifen cut cancer rates by nearly half among women who were considered at risk of getting the disease.

Critics, however, raised concerns about the drug's links to cancer in the uterine lining and to blood clots.

The institute has mailed letters announcing the breakthrough to the 13,000 women in the United States and Canada who participated in the study, which was first reported Sunday by The Philadelphia Inquirer.

"This is now the first study in the world to show that a drug can reduce the incidence of breast cancer," the letter said.

Details of the study were to be made public Monday.

Sona Thakkar, a spokeswoman for the National Cancer Institute, said researchers were not discussing the report until it was formally released. The report was expected to address the concerns about uterine cancer and the formation of blood clots.

One of the study's participants, 45-year-old Patricia Lorah of Reading, Pa., lost her mother and grandmother to breast cancer. The deaths prompted her to take part in one of the largest cancer prevention trials ever.

"I'm just thrilled. Wow!" Lorah said. "This is almost overwhelming."

Tamoxifen, made by Wilmington, Del.-based Zeneca Pharmaceuticals, is used widely to prevent the spread or return of breast cancer.

Women at risk of getting the disease because of family history, precancerous breast lesions or age were randomly assigned to five years on either a placebo pill or tamoxifen.

According to the institute, the drug reduced the rate of expected breast cancers from one in 130 women to one in 236 during the study — a decline of about 45 percent. Tamoxifen slips into estrogen receptors of breast cancer cells and locks up the cells, preventing them from growing and dividing.

Tamoxifen has been associated with increased risks for cancer in the uterine lining and with blood clots in the lungs. Those risks prompted the National Women's Health Network in Washington, D.C., to criticize the study.

"If this turns out to be a good risk-benefit ratio for some women, that will be good news," said Cindy Pearson, the group's executive director.

But researchers must tell what they know about "the cost of this benefit," she said. "Did any women die of anything caused by tamoxifen?"

Leslie Ford, the National Cancer Institute official overseeing the trial, predicted four years ago that if 16,000 women were recruited, tamoxifen would be expected to prevent 120 to 125 breast cancer cases, while producing 58 to 80 new cases of uterine cancer — which is far easier to detect early and cure than breast cancer.

In 1994, the study was suspended during congressional hearings into four uterine cancer deaths in another study of breast cancer treatment using tamoxifen. University of Pittsburgh surgeon Bernard Fisher, coordinator of the study, was investigated for reports that he was slow to address research problems.

That did not prevent women from staying in the study.

"I never considered dropping out. My thoughts were more like, 'Maybe I'll save my child's life and my own and other people's,'" said Fern Maklin, 49, of Newtown, Pa.

Study participants will be tracked for at least two more years.

Researchers still are analyzing the data. Medical recommendations for using tamoxifen to prevent cancer still are being developed, according to the letter.

The women now can go to the 270 medical centers participating in the study to find out whether they were taking tamoxifen or the placebo.

"I'm hoping I was on tamoxifen, but if I was in the placebo arm, I am going to ask my physician to put me on tamoxifen because I really believe in it," said Helen Wilson, 48, of North Wales, Pa.

Improvements planned for Denison crosswalks

TIM RICHARDSON
Kansas State Collegian

A March accident on Denison Avenue has cut through the red tape.

Improvements to three crosswalks on Denison, originally scheduled for 1999, will take place this summer. In the March accident, a freshman was struck by a car at one of the intersections.

Other crosswalk upgrades will take place in 1999, using about $120,000 from the City/University Tax Fund. Campus sales tax goes into the fund, which pays for projects that benefit Manhattan and the university. K-State will finance the immediate improvements on Denison.

Mindy Hines, freshman in musical theater, was struck by a car last month as she crossed Denison at the Platt Street crosswalk. Hines was returning from a theater rehearsal in McCain Auditorium.

John Lambert, associate director of public safety, said though the lighting improvements had been scheduled for about a year, the accident made the process of improving crosswalk lighting quicker.

> "I ALWAYS WALKED THERE AT NIGHT. IT SEEMED BETTER THAN THE OTHER CROSSWALKS BECAUSE THERE WAS LIGHT FROM THE DORMS"
> MINDY HINES
> freshman who was struck in crosswalk in March

Hines said she thought the Platt Street crosswalk was better than some others on campus, which is why she used it to make her way home.

"I always walked there at night," she said. "It seemed better than the other crosswalks because there was light from the dorms."

Hines' right leg was broken in three places, and she has a permanent metal rod to help the bone heal properly. She still does not remember the accident.

During her eight days at Mercy Health Center on College Avenue, she received calls from other students who narrowly had missed being hit in crosswalks.

"I think they were kind of upset that something wasn't done before," she said.

Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco said the campus does not have a problem with crosswalk safety, but proactive measures are being taken to make the campus as safe as possible.

"We have to continue our vigilance to make sure our pedestrians and drivers understand where the crosswalks are and obey the law," he said.

Bosco said that because early evening and night are when most near-accidents occur, the lighting improvements will increase crosswalk safety.

"We all need to be aware that people are moving, and we all need to be a little more focused on where we're going," he said.

Greg Gehrt, former president of the Illuminating Engineering Society, said some crosswalks adjacent to campus are not properly lit.

The student group conducted a study last year that measured light levels on Denison and Manhattan avenues and Claflin Road. It concluded that the current light causes a glare to drivers, which impairs their vision.

He said the problem could be avoided by directing light down to the ground, rather than up.

"They met the minimum light levels, but the problem was the type of fixtures they used," he said.

In addition to the improved lighting, three crosswalk signals are planned for Denison Avenue next year. Drivers will be made aware of the crosswalk by a flashing yellow light.

A pedestrian traffic signal also will be added at the intersection of North Manhattan Avenue and Thurston Street.

"Those are pretty major thoroughfares," Lambert said. "I believe the speed limit there is 30, and it's hard to stop at that speed."

He said police used to direct traffic at busy intersections, such as Vattier Street and North Manhattan Avenue, but this practice has been abandoned.

"Anytime you have pedestrians and vehicles intermixing, you can't solve all the problems," he said.

Hines said with the crosswalk safety plan, other pedestrians will be less likely to become accident victims.

"I think it's wonderful," she said. "I don't want to see anyone else get hurt."

Bosco said the improvements will increase campus safety, but drivers and walkers still must act responsibly.

"These improvements are only as good as our pedestrians' and drivers' alertness to walking and driving defensively," he said. "They're not going to ensure 100-percent safety."

Athletic department should justify ticket increase

In 1995, K-State students paid $7 each to see a home football game. Next year they will pay twice that amount.

And students have reason to be upset.

Bob Cavello, director of business services for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, said it is purely a business decision, but students have reason to wonder if it might be something more.

It's up to Cavello and the athletic department to give students a justification, otherwise the students are left wondering.

Students are undoubtedly wondering if the failure of the stadium expansion referendum isn't to blame for the price increase. Students can wonder if the athletic department isn't a little bitter, until they are told differently.

After all, student ticket prices are increasing from $10 a game to $14 in 1998, a 40-percent increase. At the same time, the prices for the general public will increase less than 2 percent for one season.

Students deserve answers.

The same students who supported this team in its darkest hour of the 1980s, and its finest hour this past December at the Fiesta Bowl, are left wondering just how important they are.

Coach Bill Snyder and his team always have been vocal about the importance of the Wildcat faithful, but the athletic department is sending another message.

Granted there is an extra home game next season, but $98 for student season tickets is quite a hit in the pocketbook, especially without a justification.

Football is big business in Manhattan. This town's economic well-being owes a lot to the success of the Purple and White. K-State is lucky to have some of the problems it does have.

But when students are made to feel like just another number, everybody comes out a loser.

The beautiful people

Beauty eludes definition in today's culture; people must be happy with themselves

MARNEY BURKE/Collegian

Thanks for surviving Ken Wells Media Oversaturation Week. It'll never happen again, I promise. That said, let's change the subject.

Some say beauty's in the eye of the beholder. Hell, while we're at it, let's drag out all the clichés: Beauty's only skin deep; a thing of beauty is a joy forever; a rose by any other name still has its thorn (ah, the unholy matrimony of Shakespeare and hair metal).

Beauty is apparently quite subjective. This is what I tell myself whenever Headline News coughs up a fashion segment featuring angry-looking, oddly clad, wafer-thin women thrusting themselves down a runway with haircuts that would make the Three Stooges proud. "Fashion," I suppose, is even more ethereal than beauty, and a separate animal altogether.

But sadly, it's apparently the scowling sprites who twitter and twirl in (dare I say it? Oh, all right) bad clothing through fashion shows and on magazine covers who start this avalanche of what's "in," which eventually comes crashing down from both coasts until we're covered in the debris some months later.

Thus our culture has for its modern-day Helen (or, given the fickle nature of fashion, Helen du jour) some protruding-ribbed, 17-calorie-a-day, 90-pound young woman drowning in make-up. Super.

In case the Gaultiers and Kleins (that's Calvin, not Kevin) of the world have a problem with subtext, let me insert rant here. How can I be attracted to or turned on by something that reminds me of an extra from "Schindler's List"? As a general rule, I don't want to see the ribs of something unless I'm going to be prying the same ribs off and eating them.

There are the inevitable repercussions, and if you've got a pair of X chromosomes, I'm sure you understand them better than I do. They're the eyes of the world, of people you'll never meet but who still look at you, seeing and judging your appearance every moment against those of the vaporous waifs nursing Evians in their lofts in Soho.

It's not just from one angle; this urge permeates all media, from TV pitchwomen to movie heroines to the damn Barbie dolls with proportions that would make walking utterly impossible. There is no escape; it's integrated into our culture.

So what can you do when you find out your best friend can't keep food down because of this perceived scrutiny? I'm not sure; my solution to social problems usually involves ritual ingestion of unhealthy food, so maybe I'm not quite the fount of wisdom on that point.

There isn't much I can offer in the realm of support, and even if I could, there's not much one person can offer as motivation for hordes of people bolting en masse from the yoke of fashion. But I can't stop trying.

I hope people realize there's a distinct difference between superficial titillation, if you'll forgive the term, and genuine beauty. The former is sparked by polish and veneer and quotes like, "Hi, my name is Randii with two i's, and my favorite color is clear!"

The latter is born of empathy and humor and statements like, "If you don't stop adjusting your collar I'm going to hit you with this Filet O' Fish." Attention is drawn to the former, lives are changed by the latter.

You've met the beautiful people before — they're attractive and thin and especially light, buoyed by vacuums in their skulls. And it's nice to be around pretty people, but after a while, you really want to slap some glue on the back and stick 'em up on the wall where they belong, because aside from expelling carbon dioxide (needed by plants to survive), they do nothing but clutter up the landscape, revolve around one another and give hungry squirrels moving targets.

Did you pass the "Truth About Cats and Dogs" test? My cohorts from River City apply it to anyone who hasn't seen the film. Take the film's stars, Uma Thurman (who got top billing) and Janeane Garofalo, and when the end credits roll, name the more attractive of the two. The response has thus far been unanimous, and she's not blond.

There is a quality to a person that eludes definition, something that makes a person distinctly that person. It doesn't surface in skin or on a face, but you hear whispers of it when a person speaks and laughs. It's not fed with food but with a person's mind, compassion and creativity, of which you can never have enough. It's the ultimate expression of a person's individuality, and it's the most attractive thing about any person.

But you can't package this and sell it for $5 a copy or use it to hock a fragrance. Good thing.

If you want to obsess about physicality, please, don't let me stand in your way. We all need our hobbies. Realize that sooner or later when all the flesh (and silicone) melts away, you're going to be stuck with what's left.

When you weigh your qualities and your personal priorities, don't let the media-induced perceptions force you into an unhealthy or unrealistic course of action. They're not as universal as you might feel, and they're certainly not as important as being comfortable with yourself.

A better cliché than any of the above would be, "This, above all, to thine own self be true." This is the key to personal harmony and the foundation of inner beauty.

So, anybody want some fries with that?

It had been offered to me, and as I've been known to do, I turned it down. Asking for help is something I've never been good at. Rarely do I do it. And it has nothing to do with me thinking I know it all, either.

Pride has ruled my world for as long as I can remember. When I was 19, I left home thinking I would conquer the world. I just didn't know which world.

I got as far as a studio apartment in midtown Kansas City, Mo. If you know anything about that area, it's not exactly the safest place for anyone to live, let alone a little girl. And that's pretty much what I was.

It soon became evident that I'd made a big mistake. I couldn't handle working 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. and going to night school. Life was just plain boring. I wanted to go back home. I wanted a "normal" college experience.

Did I ask for help? Nope. Damn fool.

Instead pride caused me to drop out of school, waste more money that I didn't have and move into a better apartment. I was meeting "cool" people. I always worried about what they would think. I believed I needed to keep up with the Joneses. The funny thing was that the Joneses weren't paying the bills. And pretty soon, neither was I.

Once again it was the perfect time to ask for help. I just wasn't ready to live the adult life. Not that I wanted to remain an unsophisticated young woman; I just wanted to finish my education. I knew I couldn't get anywhere without an undergraduate degree. A simple "Can I come home?" to my mom or my grandmother would have garnered a resounding "You bet," or "Anytime." And I could have stood to breathe sighs of relief.

But I just couldn't do it. Never mind the fact that I had just purchased a brand new car and was also paying the bills of some low-life boyfriend. What the hell was I thinking?

Somehow I was rescued. Grandma told me to bring my pride and my behind (although she called it something else) home. Once again I had a roof over my head that wasn't in danger of collapsing.

Two years and an associate's degree later, I crash-landed in Manhattan. At the same time, the phoenix known as pride began rising again.

Because I chose to live alone, I got to be an adult again. This time, though, I had no problem (OK, maybe a little) asking Mom for help, both financially and emotionally. And you know what? It wasn't as hard as I thought it would be. It turns out she was understanding of my need to do something worthy of her checkbook and her time spent listening.

I still got to be the college student I'd always hoped to be. But learning new academic tricks wasn't as easy as I thought. Especially in the age of new technology.

I had the hardest time in some of my classes because I couldn't get used to all the technical jargon in radio and television. And I worked in it. Rather than ask for help, I took my pride out of my pocket and used it as a force field of protection.

I was supposed to be a smart girl. Instead, I was spinning my wheels into frustration. Even when instructors held out the olive branch, I thought asking for help would make me seem like less than a person. I sacrificed a couple of good grades because of pride.

It hasn't just been about me not wanting to ask people for help. A well-paid shrink might wonder why I have such a hard time asking for help, when I enjoy availing myself to others. From family to friends to co-workers, it doesn't bother me in the least to help others.

I've been told I have a hard time giving up control, that I have "superwoman syndrome." It could just be because I have nothing better to do, or it gets me out of something I don't want to do. But if that were the case all of the time, why do I stretch myself a bit thin? Because I'm too proud to say no.

Back to my guardian angel. We've worked together now for almost two years. During this time he's not only shown me the ropes, he's saved my rear on more than one occasion. You'd think that after all this time, I wouldn't mind asking for help. Remember me? I'm the one who does whatever is the opposite of easy and painless. But I still find it difficult to ask.

I tend to use the "I don't want to bother anybody" speech. After a while, though, that gets to be a bit redundant. I probably wouldn't have as much knowledge and confidence now if I hadn't put down the pride.

It's pretty standard for the pockets of college students to be empty. I'm sure there's plenty of room in my pockets for my pride to find a home.

Readers says busing might solve problems

Editor,

I'm writing you about one of campus's hot topics: overcrowded parking lots. This is the cause of huge problems and headaches for those thousands of us who live off campus.

First of all, the amount of parking permits sold exceeds the number of available spots for students to park. Secondly, the lots available for students to park in are in remote areas of the campus. This forces us to walk halfway across campus just to get to our destination.

The solution to these huge problems is simple — a citywide and universitywide busing service. This can do nothing but help keep our parking lot from overcrowding. With this service, students can take mass transit to campus and step off near the classroom. This solution not only helps on-campus parking but also off-campus parking. We all know how hard it is to find spots in Aggieville.

We as a student body need to show we want and need this service. We must show up to Student Senate and city commission meetings and ask that our transportation needs be met.

Honor system gains support of freshman

Editor,

I'm writing in regard to the proposed undergraduate honor system that Faculty Senate will vote on in its upcoming meeting. As a student of K-State, I am concerned about academic dishonesty. I have seen cheating in classes. No one benefits from such acts. I believe Faculty Senate should pass the proposed honor code, which might help in decreasing acts of dishonesty.

With the current system, instructors who catch people can do two things: punish the student or let it go.

Perhaps we do have to live with cheating if K-State continues this academic dishonesty policy. Instructors are faced with numerous channels they might be forced to travel through. They could have meetings with their department head, the student, the student's dean, the student's adviser and the Undergraduate Grievance Committee. Of course, this is an extreme situation — but possible.

By passing the undergraduate honor system, Faculty Senate would create a single governing council called the Honor Council. This council would be the only group other than the instructor to handle academic dishonesty cases. Maybe with this council, instructors will be more willing to turn in students for dishonesty. We are encouraged to be honest and are pressured by our peers to be honest. Even though this plan will only work with the help of the students, studies have shown that it does work.

I believe students are willing to follow a new honor system. Clearly, the present one has drawbacks. By improving upon it, K-State will be better in the future. I encourage Faculty Senate to pass the undergraduate honor system for the betterment of K-State.

Summer orientation leaders chosen to assist freshman

KELLY REDDING
Kansas State Collegian

Summer orientation leaders are often the first glimpse of college life an incoming freshman might have at K-State. With another school year approaching, a new group of orientation leaders has been chosen to welcome the freshmen to K-State.

Susan Hansen, director of orientation, said she was excited about the large number of students who were recommended for the orientation positions this year.

"The quality of the candidate pool was excellent," she said. "This is a great experience that many students wanted to be involved in."

To become an orientation leader, the students had to be recommended by someone at the university, such as a professor or faculty member.

After being recommended, the students were asked to turn in résumés and written applications that included information on their own experiences at K-State and why they would want to be orientation leaders.

The last step in the process involved a two-hour selection workshop that included a one-on-one interview with Hansen.

Tara Bell, sophomore in psychology and public relations, said the workshop was not as difficult as it could seem.

"It was actually really fun," she said. "It was all about working in groups and public speaking."

Bell said that, although her workshop went well, she wasn't sure she was going to be chosen.

"There had been a change in the time of the meeting, and I wasn't sure when it started," she said. "I was so embarrassed because I showed up half an hour late."

A total of 17 students was chosen to be leaders for this summer's orientation. Their job will be to perform skits, hand out enrollment information, answer questions and give tours.

Melanie Dobbs, freshman in microbiology, said she wanted to be an orientation leader so she could help incoming freshmen figure out their schedules.

"The orientation leaders that I had went over how to pick classes, which really helped," she said. "I would have had to rely on my dad to pick my classes, which he tried to do anyway."

Kevin Henke, sophomore in animal science, said he was excited to be an orientation leader.

"I like to help people," he said. "I'm not afraid to get up there and talk. I've got pretty good public speaking skills."

Josh Brueggemann, sophomore in secondary education, said he was going to use his experiences as an orientation leader for his career.

"I am going to be a teacher, and this will be a good experience for me," he said. "I've always wanted to help people, and I think that I have enough experience to help people."

Energy secretary leaves Cabinet

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Energy Secretary Federico Pena, the highest-ranking Hispanic in the Clinton administration, announced his resignation Monday, citing personal and family reasons.

PENA

Pena, who served as transportation secretary in President Clinton's first term, submitted his formal letter of resignation to Clinton Monday morning and said he planned to return to private business.

He said he had decided to resign because he wanted to spend more time with his family and his three young children.

"In the end, we all have to make decisions about our families," Pena said at a news conference.

As Pena spoke, 9-month-old Ryan Federico crawled near his father while his two daughters, Cristina, 6, and Nellia, 7, sat in the front row, working on coloring books.

Pena, 51, declined to discuss his plans. For some time he reportedly has wanted to return to the private sector for financial reasons. The energy secretary earns $148,400 a year.

"There is never a perfect time for a decision like this, but I believe that after five-and-a-half years as a member of the Clinton Cabinet, the time is now right," Pena said in a memo sent to department employees.

Pena took over the Energy Department just more than a year ago, succeeding Hazel O'Leary at a time when some Republican members of Congress questioned the department's usefulness. He focused much of his time promoting energy conservation as a key to the administration's policy on global warming.

He said one of his biggest challenges has been the long-term effort to clean up radioactive wastes from decades of nuclear weapons production, and he said it would remain a significant problem for his successor.

Pena had planned to leave Washington, D.C., at the end of Clinton's first term. He reminded reporters Monday that he already had put his Washington house up for sale when he was asked by the president to lead the Energy Department.

Pena said he planned to depart June 30.

A likely successor, administration sources said, is Elizabeth Moler, now deputy energy secretary and former chairwoman of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

An aide said Pena made the decision to resign this weekend. He had just returned from a trip to Russia and recently talked enthusiastically about plans for the department.

Pena served four years as Transportation Secretary in Clinton's first term.

At the Transportation Department, Pena ordered small airlines to follow the same strict safety rules as larger carriers. He also sharply reduced the size of the giant agency.

But Pena was criticized widely for defending ValuJet after a 1996 crash in the Florida Everglades. The airline later was later grounded for a time because of concerns about its maintenance operation.

Pena also was the focus of two Justice Department probes, but no evidence of wrongdoing was found in either case. In one, the Justice Department cleared Pena of improperly intervening in a Coast Guard contract. The other case involved a contract awarded to Pena's former firm and on federal funds used to revamp Denver's airport.

The switch to the Energy Department was a bit bumpy because of Senate concerns about Clinton administration policies for nuclear waste disposal. Still, after some partisan bickering, the Senate voted 99-1 to confirm him.

Images might resolve dispute about 'Face on Mars'

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PASADENA, Calif. — New images released Monday from a NASA spacecraft orbiting Mars might resolve a debate about the purported "Face on Mars," a feature photographed more than 20 years ago that has become part of folklore.

Images of the site recorded during the weekend by the Mars Global Surveyor were released Monday by NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory.

After data transmitted from the spacecraft was processed, NASA began posting images on a World Wide Web site at late morning.

But the first raw image of the region of Mars called Cydonia was a dark rectangle with a blotchy white patch that might or might not be the "Face" formation seen from the Viking mission to Mars in the 1970s.

Global Surveyor also attempted to photograph the two Viking lander sites and last year's Mars Pathfinder landing site. Those images were to be released later Monday and today, said Diane Ainsworth, a JPL spokeswoman.

The "face" has taken on a life of its own since images of the shadowy, gape-mouthed visage were popularized.

While mainstream scientists say the image is a trick of light and shadow on natural features, believers say it might be part of an ancient city on Mars.

Several years ago, supporters of the "face" theory went so far as to suggest that the troubled billion-dollar Mars Observer mission was disabled by NASA on purpose to avoid photographing artificial structures on the Red Planet.

NASA lost contact with the Observer spacecraft as it was approaching Mars. Mission officials said the sabotage suggestion was preposterous.

The space agency recently announced that by chance it had an opportunity to photograph the Cydonia region and other features of public interest because of a change in plans for the Global Surveyor mission. The change was made necessary by a technical problem involving one of the spacecraft's solar panels.

The spacecraft's camera is designed to produce horizon-to-horizon wide-angle images similar to weather satellite images of Earth familiar to TV viewers, and narrow-angle images of objects as small as 4.6 feet across. The "face" is much bigger than that — it's roughly the size of a mountain.

Global Surveyor has circled Mars more than 200 times.

K-State golfers 1 stroke out of first place in North Carolina

The K-State women's golf team trailed the College of Charleston by only one stroke after the first day of play at the 7th Annual Fighting Camel Classic in Buies Creek, N.C. The Wildcats shot a 315 on Monday at the two-day par 72 tournament.

Junior Mitzi Taylor leads the tournament after posting a 76. Two other Wildcats were in the top ten. Carrie Chambers is in a tie for second and senior Ann Slater is in a tie for seventh.

The Wildcats will finish the tournament today at the Keith Hills Country Club.

Royals will try to make it 3-0 in home openers in '98 season

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Weather permitting, the Kansas City Royals will try to make it 3-0 in 1998 home openers today.

The Royals, starting their first full season with manager Tony Muser, beat Baltimore 4-1 on opening day last week, ending a string of five-straight road opening losses. Then they bested Minnesota 9-5 in what could turn out to be the Twins' last home opener in Minneapolis.

Under a threat of rain and thunderstorms, the Royals will launch their 30th home season this afternoon when lefthander Glendon Rusch (0-1) opposes Baltimore's Scott Erickson (1-0) in a rematch of the Orioles' 10-1 victory in Baltimore last Wednesday.

The Royals, coming off a second straight last-place finish in the AL Central, went 3-3 on their season-opening road trip, winning one out of three in Baltimore.

Muser, who replaced the fired Bob Boone last July, spent much of the training camp drilling the Royals on fundamentals. There also have been quite a few personnel changes from the crew that opened last year's home season with a 6-5 victory over Baltimore en route to a 67-94 campaign.

"I don't think you'll see this team making so many little mistakes as we did last year," said relief pitcher Jeff Montgomery. "It was the little things that killed us last year — throwing to the wrong base, guys getting thrown out at third base for the first out of an inning, things like that."

Among the new features at Kauffman Stadium will be new and brighter lights. All light fixtures and wiring were replaced over the winter, and two additional light standards were installed in left and right-center field. The new bulbs are smaller but brighter.

"It was the best-lighted park in baseball at one time, but the technology has changed," said general manager Herk Robinson. Also new is the backstop screen behind home plate. The old overhanging screen, which tended to obscure the field from directly behind home plate, has been replaced with a single upright screen designed to enhance fans' view.

Fans also will see different faces on the mound (Rusch for the injured Kevin Appier), and at catcher (Mike Sweeney for Tim Spehr), right field (Larry Sutton for Jermaine Dye), shortstop (Felix Martinez or Shane Halter for Jay Bell), center field (Johnny Damon for Tom Goodwin), third base (Dean Palmer for Craig Paquette) and designated hitter (Terry Pendleton for Joe Vitiello).

Kansas City native Maurice Greene, who has world records in the 100- and 60-meter dash, will throw out the ceremonial first pitch.

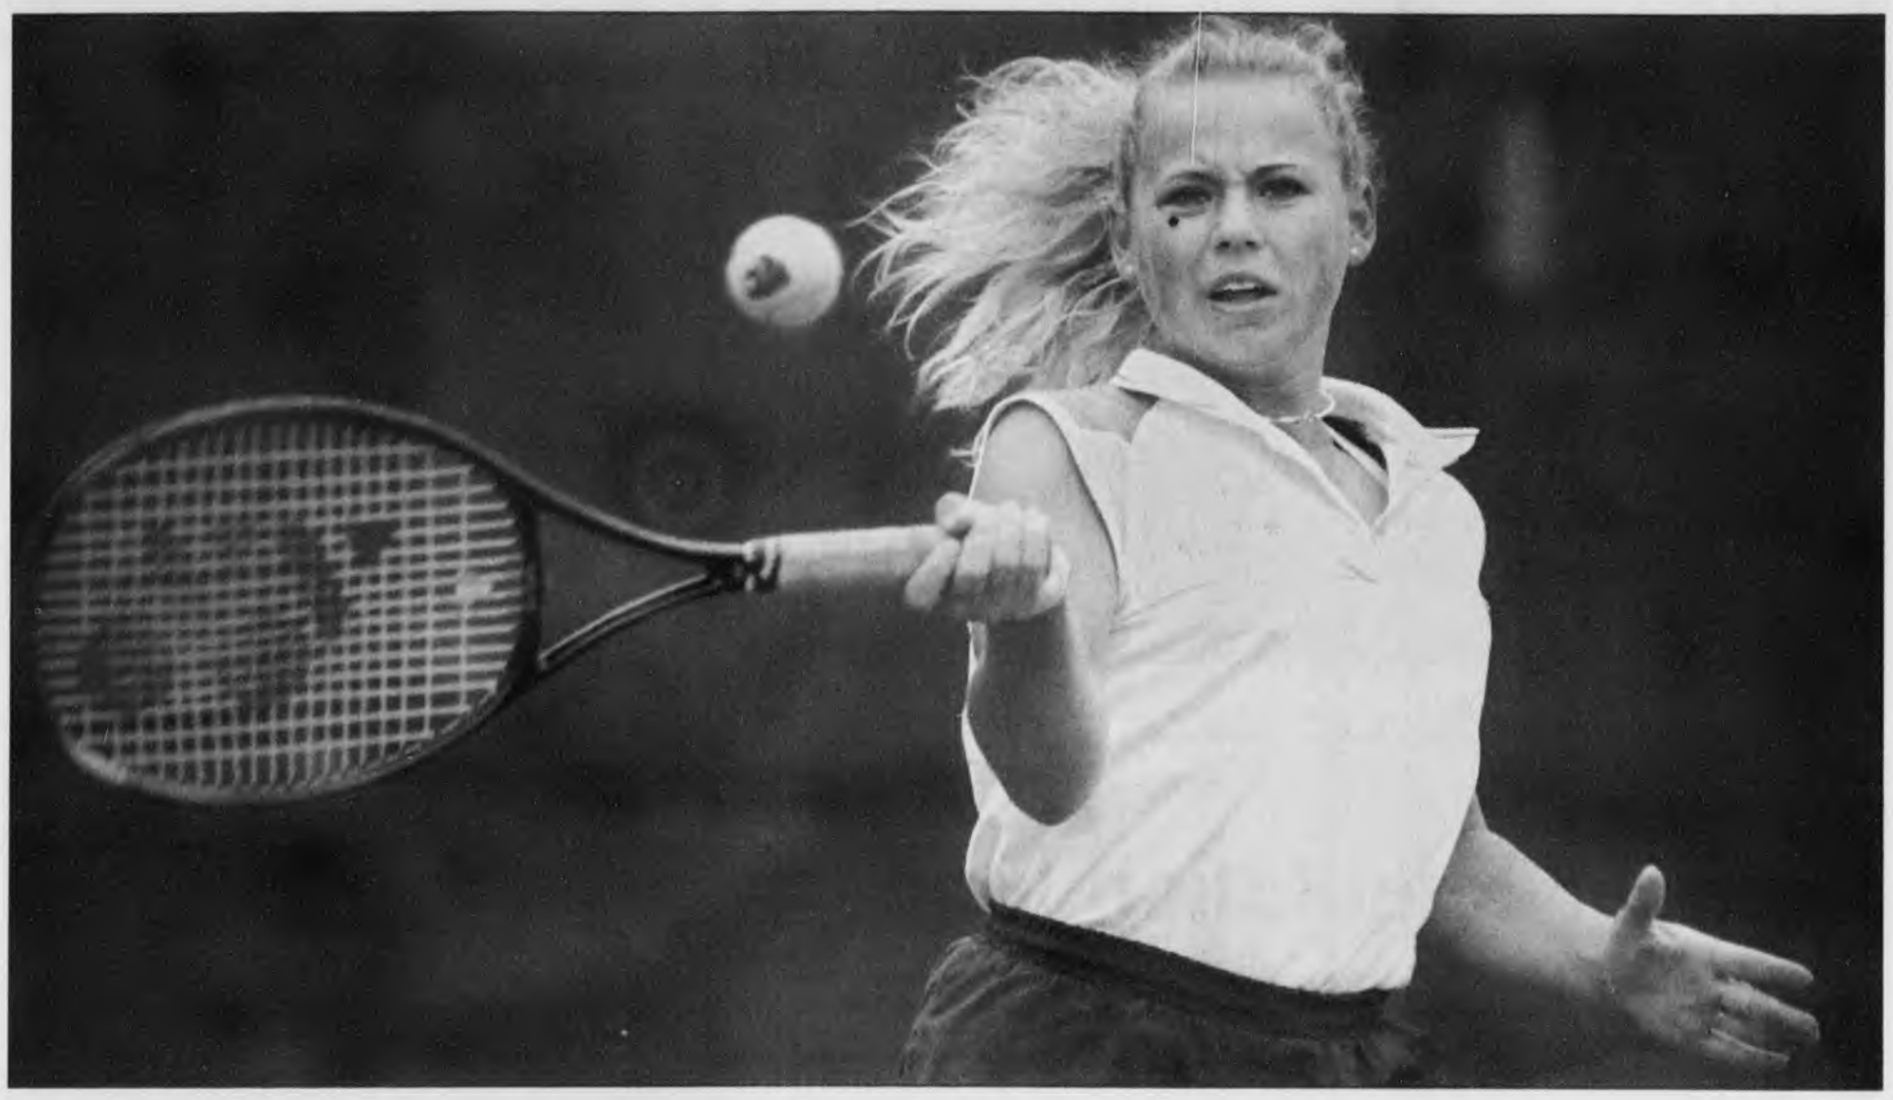
"I think opening days are kind of neat," Muser said. "It's one of the greatest songs of all time — 'Root, root, root for the home team.'"

The talent-laden Orioles, picked by many to wear the AL East crown, are off to a 5-1 start, their only loss coming in the opener at the hands of the Royals.

"Personally, I'd rather not play teams back-to-back, but that's the way the schedule works sometimes," said Baltimore outfielder B.J. Surhoff. "It comes down to executing. Opening day we gave up three runs with two outs and we lost the game. Then we came back the next night and got some two-out hits.

"If we execute, it doesn't matter where the game is being held."

It will be Baltimore's first road assignment of the season.



"On the road, you want to focus on trying to come out fighting and getting something early," said first-year manager Ray Miller, who noted last week that he hated all the "pomp and circumstance" associated with opening day. "We were very successful last year if we scored in the first inning, so you hope that continues."

Kansas City signs 2 free agents

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Free agents Ron George and Anthony Prior, released by the Minnesota Vikings in February, signed two-year contracts with the Kansas City Chiefs on Monday.

George, a 28-year-old linebacker, played in 16 games with the Vikings last year, mostly on special teams. He was a fifth-round pick out of Stanford in 1993 by the Atlanta Falcons. Minnesota signed him last year as an unrestricted free agent.

Prior, a 28-year-old cornerback, was a ninth-round pick of the New York Giants in 1992 from Washington State. He was a kick returner for the Giants and a special teams player for the Vikings.

Cats split dual with Oklahoma Sooners, Cowboys

COLLEGIAN STAFF
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State tennis team split a pair of dual meets this weekend at the L.P. Washburn Recreational Area near the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

On Saturday, the Cats dropped a close meet with the Oklahoma Sooners, 5-4. The meet came down to the final doubles match of the day.

With the score tied at four matches each, the Wildcats' No. 3 duo of Anna Pampoulova and Dinah Watson were beaten by the Sooners' Raluca Gheorghe and Stephanie Sajbert 8-2.

This was the fifth meet this season that the Cats have lost 5-4.

"Oklahoma was disappointing," Yana Dorodnova said. "It is really hard and frustrating to take these 5-4 losses."

Despite the loss, there were some high points for K-State.

Dorodnova rebounded at No. 1 singles after a loss on Wednesday to Kansas' Kylie Hunt with a 6-3, 4-6, 6-4 win over No. 56 Gheorghe.

"Yana did the right things at the right times on Saturday," K-State coach Steve Bietau said. "She played very well."

This was revenge for Dorodnova, who was beaten by Gheorghe during the fall season.

"I improved from last fall," Dorodnova said. "I made some adjustments that made the difference in the match."

Dorodnova said Gheorghe is difficult to beat from the baseline because her strokes are so consistent.

"My net play was crucial in that win," Dorodnova said.

The win was important to Dorodnova, who had struggled recently.

"The win against Oklahoma was a turning point," Dorodnova said. "It gave me some of my confidence back."

At No. 3 singles, Martina Pospisilova continued to roll with a 6-1, 6-3 victory over the Sooners' Kate Dunlevy.

On Sunday, the Cats rebounded with a 7-2 victory over the Oklahoma State Cowgirls.

Again, Dorodnova led the way with a 6-2, 6-0 triumph against the Cowgirls' Martina Hautova.

Dorodnova said she was not expecting that kind of match.

"I was very surprised I beat her so easily," Dorodnova said. "She is a very good player."

Bietau said he was happy with Dorodnova's play against Oklahoma State.

"She was pretty dominant on Sunday," he said.

Behind Dorodnova's strong play at No. 1, the Cats won five of the six singles matches — all in straight sets.

Joining Dorodnova with her second singles victory of the weekend was Pospisilova, who garnered a 6-1, 6-1 win over Marketa Chmelova.

Pospisilova also teamed with Eva Novotna' to sweep the No. 2 doubles matches giving her a perfect 4-0 weekend record.

Bietau said Pospisilova had a very good week.

"But we still haven't seen the best tennis she is capable of," he said.

Lena Piliptchak also won her two singles matches at the No. 5 spot.

The Oklahoma State meet was forced to move inside Ahearn Field House because of inclement weather.

The weekend split runs the Cats' record to 7-10 on the year with a 3-5 conference record.

Cats look to build against struggling Missouri

The K-State tennis team will do battle with the Missouri Tigers today.

The Cats are coming off a 7-2 win over the Oklahoma State Cowgirls on Sunday. In that match, the Cats won five of the six singles matches in straight sets. However, K-State suffered a tough 5-4 loss to Oklahoma on Saturday.

Those meets were against teams that traditionally are much stronger than the Missouri team, which is not one of the better programs in the Big 12. It recently has made some significant changes to its program that should help it improve.

"They are struggling to get their program going," K-State coach Steve Bietau said. "They got a new coach last year who will do a good job. They also just started giving away scholarships which should help their program."

The Wildcats have played a tough schedule this year consisting of many ranked teams. This meet should help to boost their team record.

The Cats hope to close in on the .500 mark for the season. A win would put the Cats at 8-10 overall, 4-5 in the Big 12 Conference, with two meets left in the season.

The meet is scheduled for 2 p.m. at the L.P. Washburn Recreational Area near the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

In the event of inclement weather, the meet will be moved to Ahearn Field House.

This meet will mark the fourth of five consecutive home meets. The last meet of this homestand will be the Cats' last match in Manhattan this season.

Admission is free regardless of the location.

Rush takes popular advice, stays in school

VIEWPOINT

D. SCOTT FRITCHEN

Scott is a senior in mass communications. You can send e-mail to Scott at dsf7477@ksu.edu.

I have never seen JaRon Rush play basketball. In case you didn't know, the 6-foot-7-inch Pembroke Hill High School senior is the best player in Kansas City-area high schools. And, well, I've heard about how he dazzles defenders as if he's Allen Iverson, shoots jumpers as if he's Kevin Garnett and dunks as if he's Kobe Bryant, but I feel bad.

I still haven't seen him play.

I didn't know until a couple days ago Kansas and UCLA already had their offers on the table in the middle of the 1995 season. I didn't know he really tore down a rim and shattered the backboard with five seconds left in the Raiders' 2A quarterfinals win — his final game in the Kansas City area. He's supposed to be better than Kansas City native and former NBA player Anthony Peeler. He's supposed to be one of the best ever to play in the Kansas City area.

He led the West with 19 points in McDonald's High School All-American game, scored 18 points in the Hoops Summit Tournament, and gained nationwide respect from peers and coaches.

In recent years, the NBA gene pool has reached down to the cradles of 17- and 18-year-old "diaper dandies" who see Nuggets and Nets in their sleep instead of Tarheels and Wildcats.

Wednesday afternoon, showered by comforting office lights under his high school roof, using the same pen he jots down English notes with, Rush will do the right thing. He will take the advice of high school coach Rick Allison, 265 weary Division I basketball coaches, and his parents.

Rush will sign a letter of intent with UCLA and forgo an immediate shot at the NBA. For that, he should be applauded.

Rush will stay in school.

Now, I know everybody has an opinion. Take the money. Stay in school. Take the money. Stay in school. It rings in the ears of high school basketball stars these days. Eighteen-year-olds see the aforementioned Garnett and Bryant prove a world of critics wrong and endorse shoes and play in NBA All-Star Games.

They think they can. Most can't.

Ask NCAA Executive Director Cedric Dempsey. He'll tell you, "Out of the 500,000 high school basketball players in the nation, about 50 will make an NBA team."

Or, he'll throw this one out: "Less than 3 percent of college seniors will play one year in the NBA."

Or for you gambling types: "The odds of a high school basketball player making it to the pros at all are about 10,000 to one."

Now, I've seen some good high school basketball players. I saw Vince Carter, a 6-foot-5-inch junior at Mainland High, dunk over my high school's two 6-foot-10-inch big men. I saw Allen Edwards as a junior at Miami Senior High play a decent game against my high school in the 1993 Florida High School state championship. (My high school won both those games, but that isn't the point.)

Carter and Edwards waited.

Fast forward through three years of pain, of final exams, of lousy dorm food, several heart-breaks and many long practices. Know what you got?

More than 1,500 votes from sports writers who thought Carter was the best Division I basketball player this season.

A national TV audience who witnessed Edwards perched on a ladder, trimming a basketball net after his second Division I National Championship at Kentucky.

Carter and Edwards might decide to make the leap to the NBA some time this week.

Kansas' Paul Pierce, Nebraska's Tyronn Lue and Arizona's Mike Bibby already have made the jump. Carter's teammate, Antawn Jamison, will announce some time this week whether he's ready to leave college after being named player of the year.

More than 75 undergraduates have left their alma maters after the past two seasons — the most during a two-year period. As the numbers keep increasing, high school players' chances might continue to diminish. However, three of Rush's McDonald's All-Star teammates think they already have a shot.

Would Rush make it? Who knows.

Collegiate NBA hopefuls carry the character from losing, the triumph from winning, the deep-seated desire necessary to endure the tiring 82-game regular season.

Rush knows algebra exams, senior proms, has a talent for damaging basketball rims, and, oh, I guess he also, at age 18, is one of the best high school basketball players anybody in the Kansas City area has ever seen.

He will make the smartest decision of his life Wednesday.

The NBA will wait.

Crew overcomes wind in dual, beats 6 boats

KELLY DICKSON
Kansas State Collegian

The varsity members of K-State's women's crew team beat six out of the nine boats they raced against last weekend.

The Cats traveled to Iowa City, Iowa, for a double-dual with Iowa, Drake and KU. The team's goal was to beat Iowa. The varsity beat all of the Drake boats, but the Cats lost to all three Iowa boats and one KU boat.

Rough water conditions made the starts a little tougher than normal for some of the boats. The wind especially caused problems in the first varsity eight race at the start.

"It went really well, but it was so windy that the start was kind of iffy because we thought the boats would still be aligned. Then he just started us," Heather Brunk, senior rower, said.

A rocky start leaves a boat behind the others and can cause problems all the way down the course. The first varsity eight only lost to Iowa by four seconds. There are many ways to improve a boat's time by four seconds.

"Things that we decided that we needed to work on is more length and quick catches because we missed quite a bit of water. We are going to work on length and quick catches because our focus is catching more water," Brunk said. "We were behind from the start to about 250 meters, and at 1,000 meters we made a big move. We were never quite even, but we started to move. The sprint did not go as well as we wanted it to."

The result was a four-second loss to Iowa.

The wind also caused problems at the start for the members of the second varsity eight.

"We were always getting pushed over into the other lane. It took about seven minutes to get lined up and start," sophomore rower Heather Megnia said.

The second varsity eight came in behind the Kansas A boat and beat the Kansas B boat in its first race. In the second race against Kansas the Cats found their timing and came across the line first.

> "IT WENT REALLY WELL, BUT IT WAS SO WINDY THAT THE START WAS KIND OF IFFY."
> HEATHER BRUNK
> senior rower

"We did well in both races. The first race was a lot different than the second race. We were a lot more together and had a lot better timing in the second race. What made the difference was probably that we were more focused on timing in the second race because that was what we thought about through the entire warm-up and the race," Megnia said. "We did really well meeting our goals of timing and togetherness. We are going to try and keep going with those goals and see how much better we can do in the next race."

Next weekend the Cats travel to Lawrence for a round-robin match race against the Jayhawks.

KSU alumnus might run for governor

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Arkansas City, Kan., veterinarian Steve Abrams, a 1977 graduate from K-State, said on Monday he believes he will be the conservative Republicans' chief challenger to incumbent Republican Gov. Bill Graves, based on discussions with state Chairman David Miller.

However, Miller said Abrams does not speak for him. Miller left up in the air the question of whether he will take on Graves himself in the August Republican primary.

Abrams said in an interview he plans to formally announce his candidacy for the Republican nomination for governor in early May.

Abrams, a member of the State Board of Education, made his declaration after talking last week with Miller, whom Abrams said encouraged him to go full steam ahead.

Abrams' confirmation that he will announce his candidacy within a month seemed to erase the possibility that Miller himself might challenge Graves.

But in a separate telephone interview, Miller said, "I don't think it's any place to attempt to speak for anyone else, and it would be a mistake to believe I have authorized another candidate to speak for me."

Miller said he would have more to say about his status as a potential candidate later this week.

There has been speculation recently that Miller was preparing to seek the GOP nomination. His criticism of Graves on how large the tax-relief package being developed by the administration and the Republican-controlled Legislature was had fueled that speculation.

Abrams said he met last Thursday with Miller and came away with a different conclusion.

"He said he was not running at this time, and he encouraged me to run," Abrams said. "He said, 'I just wanted to let you know that I am not running at this time and for you to go full steam ahead' — and I plan on it.

"I don't think there's any doubt that he'd like to be governor some day," Abrams said of Miller, 48, a former legislator who has led the state party since January 1995 and has clashed often with Graves over party policy.

"I think he was saying to me that he doesn't plan to do it at this time, and I don't expect him to," Abrams said.

"He said, 'I'm not going to interfere with you at all.' He was very encouraging."

Abrams, also 48, said he will tour a number of cities soon after legislative adjournment — scheduled for May 1 or 2 — to make his candidacy official.

A group of conservative leaders has met twice in the past couple of weeks trying to identify a candidate to back against Graves.

"They'll support me," Abrams said. "I think it's safe to say they'd just as soon not have the current governor re-elected."

Abrams said Graves has made conservative Republicans angry over the issues of abortion, gun control, government spending and taxes.

"I think he's vulnerable because he's hacked-off a lot of traditional Republicans," Abrams said.

"Obviously, the pro-lifers, the Second Amendment people and the tax people. There are a lot of places that he's vulnerable."

Abrams said he knows Graves will have a huge advantage in money available for a campaign, but said it won't matter.

"As long as I can get my people out to vote, it won't count very much," he said of Graves' campaign warchest, now well more than $1 million.

Abrams said he expects to have large numbers of volunteers in all areas of the state.

"We are not writing off any area of the state," he said.

Clinton blocks import of 1.6 million rifles

ASSOCIATED PRESS

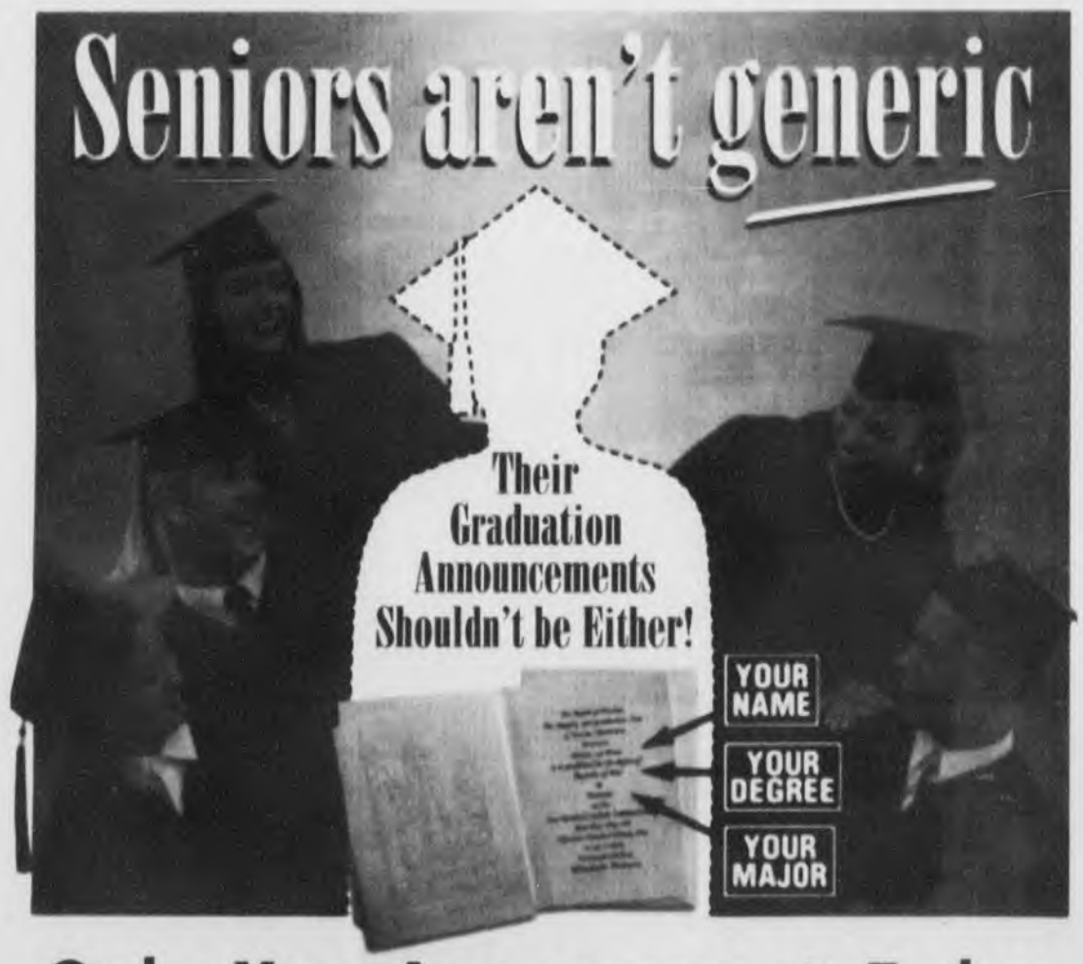
WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton blocked the import of 1.6 million military-style rifles Monday, saying Americans do not need an Uzi or AK-47 for hunting deer or skeet shooting.

"These are military weapons, weapons of war," Clinton said.

The order bars 58 high-powered, foreign-made guns with large-capacity magazines after finding they failed to meet an exemption to U.S. gun laws as a sporting rifle. Most of the affected guns were variations of the AK-47 and Uzi semiautomatic weapons.

"They were never meant for a day in the country, and they are certainly not meant for a night on the streets," Clinton said. He announced his decision on a sunny day in the Rose Garden, with 15 uniformed law enforcement officials standing behind him in a silent show of support.

Press secretary Mike McCurry said the announcement was made within the context of a nation still grieving from the schoolyard killings in Jonesboro, Ark. However, those weapons would not be covered because they were made in the United States, not imported.



Clinton's Rose Garden appearance opened a week the administration hoped would give the president a burst of momentum following the dismissal of Paula Jones' sexual harassment suit and Clinton's successful Africa trip. With Congress out of town, Clinton will be alone in the spotlight.

On a three-day trip — this time in the United States — the president will focus on Social Security's financial troubles in a speech today in Kansas City, Mo. Clinton will fly to Chicago for a Democratic fund-raiser tonight. On Wednesday, he will speak at a Chicago school on education issues. Thursday, he will go to Kentucky for an anti-smoking appearance.

The action against assault-style rifles was set in motion last November when Clinton ordered a review of imports of semiautomatic weapons. Members of Congress and others had expressed concern that the weapons, with slight modifications, were essentially the same as semiautomatic assault-style rifles banned in a 1989 decision by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

Clinton said foreign gun makers were making small cosmetic modifications to skirt the law. To those manufacturers, he said, "You can read the fine print in our law and our regulations all you want, and you can keep making your minor changes. But we're going to do our best to keep our people alive and stop you from making a dollar the wrong way."

Dow breaks 9,000-point milestone

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Bulling past a new milestone, the Dow Jow industrial average on Monday closed above 9,000 for the first time, extending a relentless climb that got its final nudge from the biggest business merger ever.

The nine-month journey, which included a brief detour below 7,000 during October's swoon, was long and hard — at least by recent standards.

But dire predictions of the bull market's impending collapse just five months ago could not choke investors' appetite for stocks. Monday's first-time Dow close above 9,000 represents a stellar 14.2-percent gain for this year, a bigger climb than even the most optimistic forecasts for all of 1998.

The push that tipped the Dow over the 9,000 milestone was fitting.

Investors have kept the bull market running by putting their savings into mutual funds at financial services companies. On Monday, Citicorp and Travelers Group returned the favor, announcing a merger made possible by their rising stock values that sent financial stocks surging further ahead.

Without the rise in financial stocks, the Dow would have missed the historic marker and lost ground for the day.

"It's just a big bull run because there's so much money around," said Eugene Mintz, financial markets analyst at Brown Brothers Harriman & Co. "Certainly the merger of Citicorp and Travelers is an outgrowth of the bull market."

The Dow rose 49.82 points to 9,033.23 Monday, gaining an unprecedented 1,124.98 points in just more than three months after starting the year at 7,908.25.

Despite a rise in the Dow, declining issues outnumbered advancers by about a 4-3 ratio on the New York Stock Exchange.

Volume on the floor of the Big Board came to 629.10 million shares., down from 649.11 million in the previous session.

Suddenly, despite opening the year with a 4-percent slide, the Dow isn't far from extending its already unmatched three-year string of more than 20-percent gains. Some Wall Street experts have raised their Dow targets to 10,000 and beyond, but many are standing by their forecasts.

"My point of view will sound incredibly grumpy against this ebullient background. This pendulum could swing further. We could end up the year a little lower than where we are now," said Charles G. Crane, chief market strategist at Key Asset Management. "We're dealing in a psychological currency that's as powerful as I've ever seen."

The Dow demonstrated the market's whimsy on Friday by dropping to close below 9,000 after crossing the historic mark for the first time. Again on Monday, the blue-chip stock index receded from its early 111.35-point rise.

Few would argue that the backdrop has changed considerably since July, when the Dow first blew past 8,000.

Back then, there was reason for the optimism: high employment, but low inflation; robust economic growth, but low interest rates; and, most importantly, steady gains in corporate profits. The Dow, which covered the ground from 6,000 to 7,000 in four months and from 7,000 to 8,000 in five months, seemed destined to make quick work of 9,000.

That was before the Asian economy began unraveling in August, eventually setting off a global financial panic that pushed the Dow into a record 554-point slide on Oct. 27. The next day, the Dow slid another 178 points to 6,983 before reversing course.

Notably, the nearly 30-percent rebound from the bottom of that slide has come without any clear resolution to the Asian crisis. It's still unclear how much of an impact the turmoil there will hurt companies here, but investors were much pacified in late January by some generally strong profit reports for the final three months of 1997.

"My concern is that the Asian recessions have only just begun," said Eric Miller, chief strategist at Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette Securities.

Overall projections for U.S. corporations' first-quarter earnings have been whittled down to 2 percent above year-ago levels, but forecasts for all of 1998 still call for 11-percent growth.

Only half-joking, William P. Miller, chief investment officer at American Express Asset Management Group in Minneapolis, signaled the quest for the next milestone.

"Dow 10,000 isn't far away," Miller said.

Jury selection under way in Koch family lawsuit

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Jury selection began Monday in a federal lawsuit involving the four multimillionaire Koch brothers and the nation's second-largest privately held corporation.

U.S. District Judge Sam Crow presided over the questioning of about 60 potential jurors for the lawsuit, which was filed in 1985.

Questioning of the jury pool began after a morning conference among Crow and the attorneys for the 15 plaintiffs and six defendants. The trial could last six weeks.

The plaintiffs are led by Bill Koch, the youngest of the Koch brothers by minutes. The defendants include Koch Industries and its chairman, Charles Koch.

Crow questioned potential jurors himself, asking them whether they had read or heard anything about the case. Only a half-dozen said they had, and most said they would not be influenced.

The judge dismissed only one juror, Virgil Wallentine, the director of K-State's Department of Computer and Information Sciences. Wallentine said he recently had attended a Koch Industries reception for K-State alumni.

"The money they contribute, I have control over that," Wallentine said.

The lead attorneys for both sides also questioned prospective jurors, who had filled out questionnaires. One question was whether a potential juror had problems with one family member suing another.

"Some of you have said, 'Gee, I don't think there should be a suit where one family member is suing another family member,'" said Fred Bartlit, of Chicago, the plaintiffs' lead attorney.

In their lawsuit, Bill Koch and the other plaintiffs contend dissident stockholders were cheated when Charles Koch and other stockholders bought them out in 1983.

They claim the true value of the company was concealed and they are owed more than $1 billion.

The defendants claim the lawsuit is the result of a legal vendetta by Bill Koch and his "lifelong history of feelings of inferiority."

Both Bill and Charles Koch sat in the courtroom but did not make eye contact. Bill Koch sat at his attorneys' table; Charles Koch sat with other defendants behind their attorneys.

Koch Industries has said its sales in 1997 were $30 billion, making it second in size for a privately held company only to agribusiness giant Cargill. The company operates major oil refineries, cattle ranches, cattle feed lots, grain elevators and natural gas pipelines.

The legal battle pits Frederick Koch, at 64 the oldest brother, and Bill Koch, 57, against Charles Koch, the 62-year-old hand-picked successor to his father, and David Koch, 57, the older twin brother of Bill Koch.

After court recessed for the day, Bill Koch walked past David Koch without saying a word.

Charles Koch is low key, preferring to read philosophy and eat lunches in the Koch Industries cafeteria.

Bill Koch is his flamboyant brother, winner of the 1992 America's Cup yachting trophy and creator of the Koch Crime Commission.

According to a witness list filed with Crow, Bill Koch's attorneys plan to call Charles and David Koch to testify as hostile witnesses. Those two also plan to testify in their own defense.

Crow has agreed to allow Charles Koch and his fellow defendants to present evidence concerning seven of 15 lawsuits in which Bill Koch has been involved since filing the one over the stock sale.

He also is allowing some testimony about the Koch family history and how well the brothers get along with one another.

Bill Koch's attorneys had sought to bar such evidence, saying it would prejudice a jury.

In an order on evidentiary issues he issued Friday, Crow said it is common for one side in a lawsuit to disparage the other side's evidence.

"This is why most courts, facing this situation, will wait to see how the evidence and events unfold at trial before ruling on admissibility," Crow said. "This is what the court has done here."

Art comes in all forms, be it large or small, detailed or abstract. Proof of this can be seen at the joint exhibit in the Union art gallery.

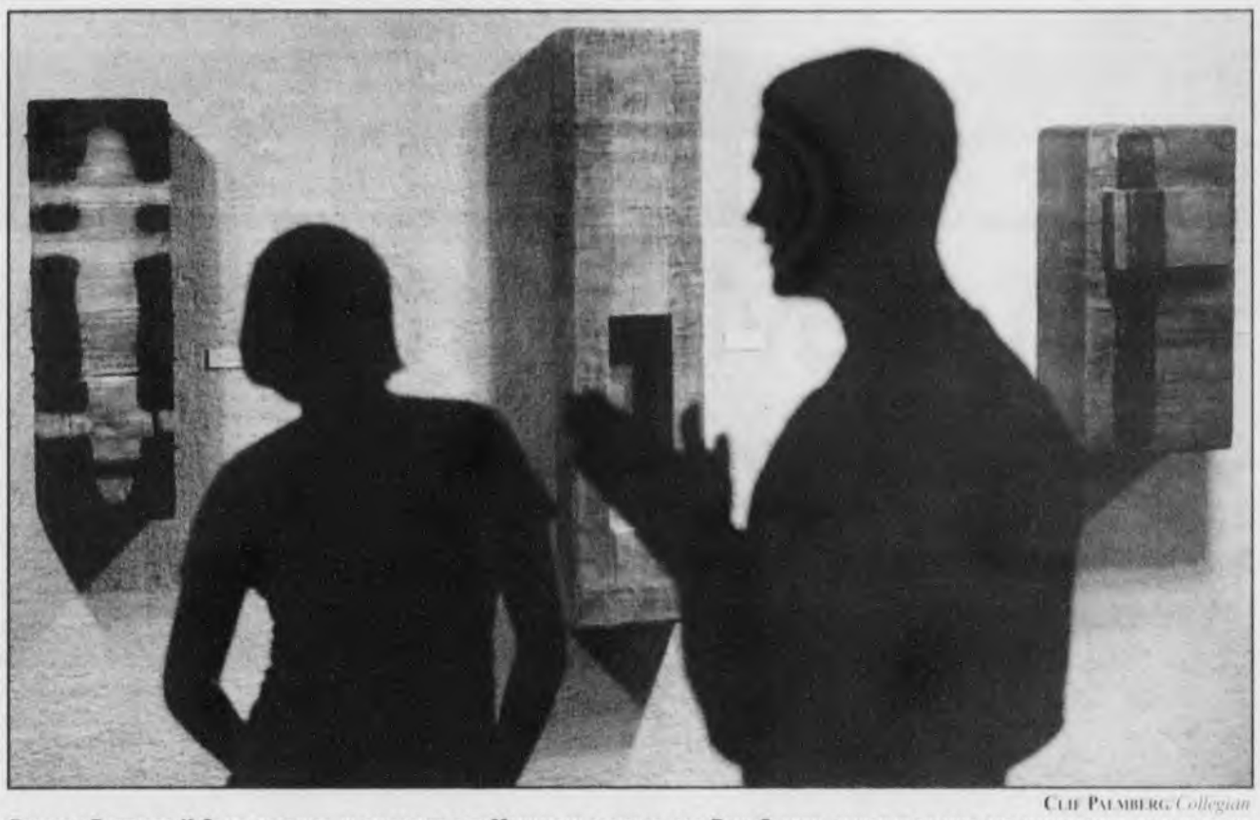
Upon entering the gallery, one notices a large casket-looking metallic sculpture in the middle of the floor. Attached along the left wall are several displays of tiny, detailed metallic objects encased in glass. Along the back wall are sculptures with parts on both the wall and the floor. The right wall displays more sculptures and two cards explaining the work.

Suzanne Pugh and Justin Williams are two of the graduate teaching assistants who have their work displayed at the Union art gallery this semester.

Their exhibit, "1211," runs until Friday. Pugh said there were five students who were able to show their work in four exhibits, so she and Williams decided to have a joint exhibit.

"We both came to K-State the same year. We think alike, and we both appreciate each other's work," Pugh said.

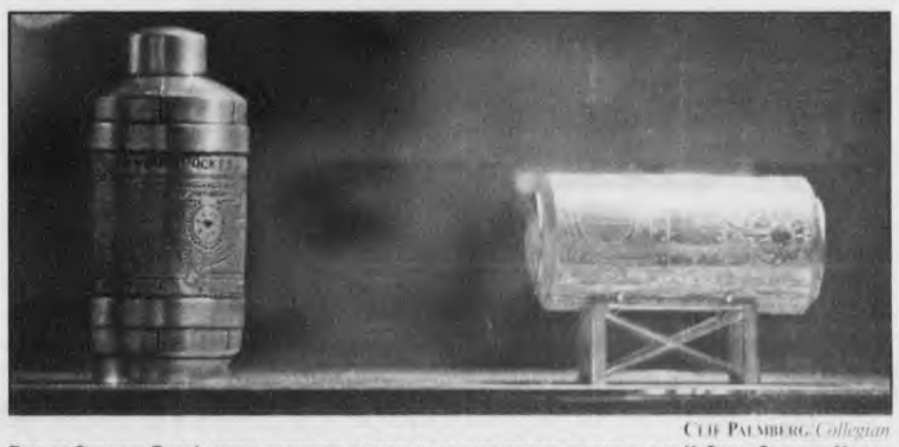
Pugh said her art is a way to communicate what she is feeling, whether it is frustration or giddiness. Pugh said she wants people to think about her work and to find their own meaning from it.



"You have to develop your own style. A lot of students have to struggle to find it, but it has to be done," Pugh said.

Pugh's style deals with metalsmithing and minute detail. Most of her pieces in the exhibit are small and detailed. The pieces done by Williams are larger and of varied material.

"I used to do more abstract work, but now I focus on more rectangular objects. I use boxes and things with corners because it's a format people are more familiar with," Williams said.



A majority of the work featured in the exhibit by Williams was inspired by Egyptian culture. Williams said he was going to leave the "organs" in the boxes and then take an x-ray look at the art, but found it was better to place them on the ground.

"It's more like a ritual. People have to bend down to see the art on the floor, and then they have to look up from the ground to see the rest of it," Williams said.

'South Park' targets adults, reaches youths

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — For years, tobacco companies insisted they never marketed cigarettes to youngsters, even as smoking became increasingly "cool" and youth kept lighting up.

The booming popularity of Comedy Central's "South Park" presents an uncomfortable parallel for the TV industry.

The animated comedy of controversial third-graders comes with curses, bathroom jokes and Kenny, a character who meets a horrific demise every week. Comedy Central's unprecedented ratings affirm its status as television's biggest new sensation short of "Ally McBeal."

But "South Park" wants only adult viewers. Doug Herzog, Comedy Central's top executive, makes that clear: It's the only series on television to carry a TV-MA rating.

Yet research shows that 20 percent of viewers are 17 and younger. So is there a better way for Comedy Central to keep youngsters from tuning in? Some school administrators and many parents are wondering whether more can be done.

Earlier this month, an elementary school principal in Canton, Ga., threatened to send children home if they wear clothes with "South Park" characters. Two principals in New Jersey wrote letters alerting parents to the show.

Kathi Rodger-Sachs, of the Henrietta Hawes School in Ridgewood, N.J., discovered first-grade pupils playing "Kill Kenny," with one child shouting a racial epithet.

"Our children are very impressionable," the principal said. "If they see this as a norm, their behavior is going to reflect that."

Herzog admitted enduring a few sleepless nights before putting "South Park" on the air last August. Comedy Central's president and CEO said he knew the series would push television's barriers, but he called the show brilliant and its humor not gratuitous.

So he scheduled it for 10 p.m. on Wednesday and agreed to the rating disclaimer "for mature audiences."

"We just want to say it as many times as we can — if you're going to be offended, don't watch," he said, "and please, please, please pay attention to what your kids are watching."

That's not always so easy, said Denise Clapham, a mother of four from Brunswick, N.Y. Children watch television in their rooms or at friends' homes, with tapes easy to come by.

"It's out there, and they're going to see it, no matter what restrictions are put on it," she said.

Clapham said she's not thrilled that her 16-year-old son and his friends are "South Park" fans.

"I think they can be funny without being that far out," she said, "and I'm liberal."

Yet trying to keep children away from a show such as "South Park" runs counter to human nature and the lure of forbidden fruit, said Dan Anderson, a psychology professor who researches children's television at the University of Massachusetts.

In many respects, a TV-MA rating is a magnet. "Kids want to grow up," Anderson said. "They want to be older than they really are."

Comedy Central's Herzog is not sure what more to do, except maybe schedule the show for later. But he said children still would find a way to watch the show.

The alternative — taking "South Park" off the air — raises even more disturbing questions about whether television has any room at all for such adult-oriented material.

On this issue, Comedy Central has an important ally. Kathryn Montgomery, whose Center for Media Education lobbied in Washington, D.C., for TV ratings, said she believes the cable channel has acted responsibly.

"You can't expect all of the programming on cable television and television in general to be appropriate for kids," Montgomery said. "What we do need to do is educate the parents."

No TV executive likes criticism, but Herzog tries to see the New Jersey school principals as allies, not enemies. Anything that gets the word out that "South Park" is not for children is helpful, he said.

Herzog said Comedy Central has not licensed products specifically for children; there are no "South Park" lunch boxes and no "South Park" kids' clothing. He claims no youthful viewers when selling commercial time. And he said he believes any comparison to tobacco companies is ultimately unfair.

"There's no warning label on Comedy Central that says if you watch too much, it's going to cause cancer," he said.

Herzog said the children viewing "South Park" have become a problem he would rather not deal with.

"I'm not making money off them. Quite frankly, I wish they wouldn't watch it because it's a bit of a hassle.

Speech to focus on research about learning

SHELLY SLATIER
Kansas State Collegian

A professor and interim director of the Center for the Study of Higher Education at the Pennsylvania State University will help students evaluate their college experience Thursday.

Patrick J. Terenzini, also the past president of the Association for the Study of Higher Education, will share findings on his continuing research in a presentation, "Are We Really Serious About Learning?" at 10:30 a.m. Thursday in Forum Hall.

His presentation is part of the Chester E. Peters Lecture Series presented by the Student Development Department.

John D. Steffen, associate professor of counseling and education psychology, said Terenzini will focus on the outcomes of higher education.

"He does research on how students learn, what they learn inside of the classroom, what they learn outside of the classroom and under what conditions they learn in," Steffen said.

He said anyone who wants to know about what they learn as an undergraduate should come listen to Terenzini. Current students, faculty, administrators and the community are invited to attend.

"The most important thing people should ask themselves is are they getting everything they can out of the college experience," Steffen said.

Damon Sloan, graduate student in student personnel and assistant resident life coordinator of Goodnow Hall, said he is going to find out more on how students grow and develop.

"I'm hoping to learn how one can relate in-classroom experience with out-of-classroom experience," Sloan said. "Learning doesn't take place in one area. Both learning experiences are integrated."

Steffen said students interested in evaluating their college education against that of their peers will benefit from Terenzini's speech. He said people attend college for more reasons than to get a job.

"Terenzini has done research in what students want out of college and a large percentage say to get a job," Steffen said. "Jobs don't require technical training but a good educational background."

Terenzini's research focuses on undergraduate students. Steffen said he has looked at university students and community college students and compared their different college experiences.

Sloan said Terenzini is a leader in the student affairs profession.

"To have someone like Patrick Terenzini at K-State is a special opportunity," Sloan said. "He is on the forefront of the profession of student affairs."

Mail carrier kills ex-wife, son, then self

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MAPLE HILL, Kan. — An estranged couple and their 4-year-old son were found dead at a house in rural Wabaunsee County, apparently the victims of a double murder and suicide.

The dead were identified as Ronald Whittington, 41, a rural mail carrier; Janis Whittington, 43; and their son, Benjamin, 4.

Neighbors discovered the woman and the boy shot to death Saturday, then found the body of the woman's ex-husband nearby with a shotgun.

"At this point, it appears to be another domestic violence tragedy," Wabaunsee County Sherriff Richard Old said.

Janis Whittington's mother, Barbara Stevenson, said Monday her daughter and son-in-law were getting a divorce and final papers were to be signed this week.

The child and his mother were living in Silver Lake, near Topeka. Janis Whittington picked up her son at the babysitter's Friday afternoon to take him to Maple Hill to spend the weekend with his father.

Neighbors told officers they heard gunshots coming from the direction of the home Friday afternoon, but they thought the shots came from a skeet-shooting range on a neighboring farm.

Neighbors became suspicious Saturday morning when Janis' car was still in the driveway and the door was open. When they went to the house to check on the couple, they discovered the bodies, Old said.

Ronald Whittington's mother, Gladys Whittington, said Monday she could not believe her son could kill his former wife and son.

"I can't believe that Ron did that," she said.

She said her son's neighbor told her that Ronald Whittington was excited about having Benjamin stay with him during the weekend.

Brownback announces candidacy, plans to tour Kansas in search of votes cal VIPs — including his fellow senator Pat Roberts, Gov. Bill Graves, Secretary of State Ron Thornburgh, State Treasurer Clyde Graeber, a dozen legislators, his wife, Mary, and their three children.

Brownback's announcement came as no surprise, of course. He had made clear since winning the Dole seat 17 months ago that he planned to seek the full term in 1998.

His Topeka announcement launched a two-day, nine-city tour, which took him from here to Wichita, Pittsburg and Johnson County on Monday and will take him to Salina, Hays, Colby, Garden City, Dodge City and back to Wichita today.

The announcement tour will culminate with a rally at Wichita's Jabarra Airport tonight, at which the star attraction will be Bill Bennett, former federal education secretary and a leading conservative family values advocate.

Brownback, 41, served six years as state agriculture secretary before winning election to Congress in Kansas' 2nd District in 1994.

He defeated Democrat Jill Docking in 1966 to claim the last two years on Dole's Senate seat. Dole resigned in June 1996 to devote full time to his unsuccessful run for president.

No one has indicated an interest in challenging Brownback for the Republican senatorial nomination in the August primary. Feleciano is the only Democrat to show interest.

"I need to get commitments," Feleciano said of finalizing his decision to run.

"I want to firm them up before I take the plunge. But I'm amazed at the number of moderate Republicans who are asking me to run."

He said those Republicans say, "They made a horrible mistake in not electing Jill Docking, and Sam is not one of them. He's too far-out conservative."

Feleciano, 56, a 26-year veteran of the Legislature, said moderate Republicans "remember how he got where he is — that he got there by destroying a very fine woman, Sheila Frahm (in the 1996 GOP primary), and by destroying another very bright, very moderate woman, Jill Docking."

Brownback, a native of Parker in Linn County and graduate of K-State and the University of Kansas School of Law, said he is proud of what he believes he has helped accomplish in Congress — a tax cut, balanced budget and welfare reform.

"What lies ahead for America excites me even more," Brownback said. "I think our best days are just ahead of us. It is for that reason I announce to you today my candidacy for the United States Senate."

Palestinian officials clear Israel in death of Hamas bombmaker

ASSOCIATED PRESS

RAMALLAH, West Bank — Palestinian security officials cleared Israel on Monday in the death of the chief Hamas bombmaker, saying he was shot by a rival Hamas member who tried to cover up the slaying by disfiguring the body in a bomb blast.

Hamas leaders rejected the findings. They insisted Israel was responsible for the death of Mohiyedine Sharif, and said the Hamas military wing, Izzedine al Qassam, probably would make good on its threats to carry out revenge bombings in Israel.

Sharif's death has strained ties between Hamas and Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority.

An open confrontation with Hamas would make it easier for Arafat to crack down on the militants, as demanded by Israel as a condition for a troop pullback in the West Bank.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said the investigation proved that the Palestinian Authority was capable of fighting terrorism and it must continue its efforts.

"That, I think, would pave the way for the resumption of the peace process," Netanyahu said. But he also said he regretted that some Palestinian officials had been so quick to cast blame.

Sharif's body was found at the scene of a car bomb blast in a garage in an industrial zone of the West Bank on March 29, and the circumstances of his death were unclear for days.

"I can say now that Israel is not responsible for that operation," said Palestinian Planning Minister Nabil Shaath, who several days ago had accused Israel of involvement.

A senior Palestinian security official said Monday that Sharif was killed by Adel Awadallah, a rival for leadership of Izzedine al Qassam.

On March 29, Awadallah and a teenage bombmaker, Ghassan Addasi, drove Sharif to a remote area, the official said.

Awadallah shot and killed Sharif, packed the body in the car and then drove to Ramallah. Addasi and Awadallah rigged the car with explosives, placed Sharif's body near it and detonated the bombs with a timer, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The two apparently hoped the body would be disfigured enough to erase all signs of the shooting. However, only Sharif's right leg was torn off by the blast, the official said.

Hamas has carried out more than a dozen suicide bombings in Israel since 1994, killing scores of people.

Addasi, along with two other Hamas members, is under arrest, but Awadallah remains at large, the official said.

Addasi's family said he was innocent. His 26-year-old brother, Isam, said Ghassan spent the evening of the killing praying at the mosque, having dinner with his family and going to bed early.

The other two suspects were not identified. Jibril Rajoub, the Palestinian security chief in the West Bank, said they included people whom Sharif had trained and others who had helped hide him.

Sharif, 32, topped Israel's most-wanted list as the mastermind of several suicide bombings. He had been on the run since August 1995, moving from safehouse to safehouse.

Abdel Aziz Rantisi, a leader of Hamas in the Gaza Strip, said the investigation's results are not acceptable to Hamas. Rantisi insisted that Israel ultimately was responsible for Sharif's death.

Asked on Israel radio whether Hamas would go ahead with previously threatened revenge attacks, Rantisi said: "I believe in the way of Hamas, and that is that it will indeed react."

The Palestinians also took care to fill in the Americans on their investigation. Israel's Channel One said CIA officials received a briefing in Ramallah.

In response to the Hamas threats, Israeli security forces have been on heightened alert, patrolling markets, malls and bus stations in Jerusalem and tightening controls at West Bank roadblocks.

Israel was expected to seal off the West Bank and Gaza Strip before the start Friday of the weeklong Jewish holiday of Passover to prevent possible attacks.

In Jerusalem, disturbances broke out in Arab neighborhoods after a Palestinian driver was shot to death by Israeli police after he refused to stop. Later, local residents began stoning police cars. Tires were burned, and Israeli buses were stoned outside the Old City.

Bishop, Snyder shift focus back to 1998 season

SUN DEE MILLS
Kansas State Collegian

Wildcat quarterback Michael Bishop received the chance to respond to public criticism Tuesday at the team's first spring football press conference.

Bishop was arrested the morning of Feb. 22 on one count of battery and two counts of aggravated battery in relation to a fight that broke out in the Aggieville area.

But Bishop spoke openly of the evening and his feelings about the situation, saying he was glad the truth finally came out.

"I'm ready to put it all behind me and concentrate on football and concentrate on being the best that I can be," Bishop said. "I'm learning the rest of the offense and want to totally contribute to the team."

BISHOP

After the arrest, further investigation revealed Bishop was not involved in the fight other than attempting to break it up. He said he was hurt by the accusations at first, but could not place blame on anyone.

"I felt like the police were doing their job," he said. "They went on what they had and what they heard. They had to act, and they did what they had to do."

Bishop then related the events of the evening.

"The fight broke out, and just like a lot of other people, I tried to break it up," he said. "Then I ended up getting part of the blame put on me," he said. "But I can understand that. There were a lot of things going on, and there were a lot of people there, and I can see why my name came up."

Both Bishop and head coach Bill Snyder said they understand athletes won't be treated like regular K-State students because of their high profiles. Snyder said this situation presents an issue with him.

"We say, 'Hey, athletes shouldn't be treated differently than anyone else,'" Snyder said. "Then you ask yourselves a question, 'Did you treat this athlete differently?' You're doggone right you did. You treated him differently than John Q. Student."

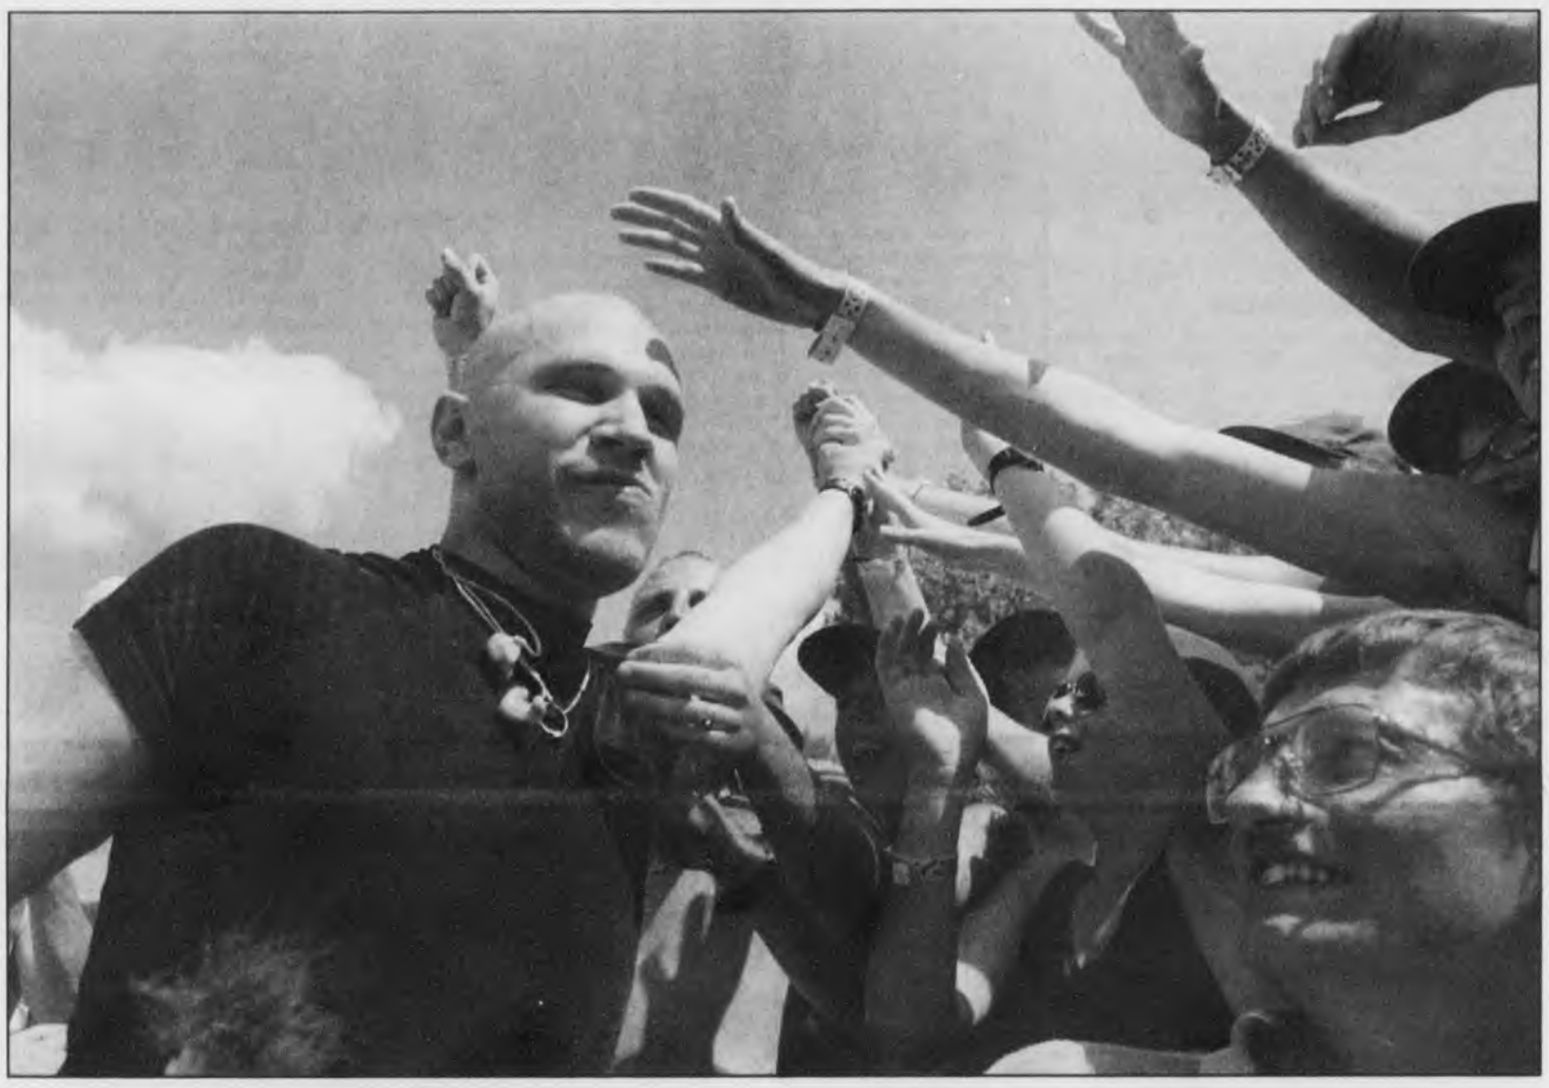
SNYDER

Snyder made it clear he didn't blame the media for making the story public but tried to stress the power the press has in situations such as this one.

"People that see you on television and read the media believe everything that you write," he said. "Now you write what you've been told, I understand that. But people absolutely believe that. That's the gospel."

On visits with people close to the Wildcat football program, Snyder said he still has a hard time convincing them that Bishop was not involved in any wrongdoing. Snyder attributed the problem to the story of Bishop's innocence not getting out of the state of Kansas or even the Manhattan community.

"It's hard for them to have the belief that something didn't happen. The deal is, something didn't happen," Snyder said. "I don't know who made retractions and who has not. But sometimes those get lost, too. The initial story is on the six o'clock news, and the retraction is on at four in the morning."



Although some athletes say they don't want to be viewed as role models, Bishop isn't one of them. Snyder said Bishop is good with children and enjoys spending time with them.

But an incident in Manhattan Town Center with a mother and her child disturbed Bishop, Snyder said.

"Wherever he goes, his time is taken with youngsters and not-so-young youngsters wanting his time and his comments and his autographs," Snyder

▶ PRODUCER EXPECTS MORE FANS TO ATTEND.

AMY MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

Although Country Stampede is still a couple months away, ticket sales are booming and work is under way to get Tuttle Creek State Park ready for the June 26-28 event.

Gil Cunningham, producer of the event, said ticket sales are ahead of where they were last year at this time. He said crowds should be in the tens-of-thousands range.

"We are anticipating crowds in the 20,000 range every day," he said.

Cunningham, of the Don Romeo Agency in Omaha, Neb., said the agency is busy processing the last of the early-bird ticket sales. After May 1, ticket prices go up.

He said right now he is working on two challenges in particular for this year's Country Stampede: a pre-event concert and more campsites.

▶ What do we think?
The Collegian editorial board calls for better planning in this year's Country Stampede. See Page 4.

"We're having a special Thursday night promo, so that's a little different. We'll also have additional camping this year."

The show Thursday will feature Dustin Evans and Neal McCoy and will be free to VIP and three-day ticket holders and $10 per person for the general public.

Todd Lovin, park manager for Tuttle Creek State Park, said numbers from Country Stampede helped to get the water system at the park improved.

"We do have a water system upgrade that we're going through," he said. "The stampede was instrumental in getting that grant for the upgrade."

He said the upgrade was not only for Country Stampede, but for all users of the park. The current water system tended to fail on occasion.

"The system was aged and needing to be replaced," he said.

Financial figures still cloudy for 1997 concert

AMY MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

The financial figures for last year's Country Stampede are hard to pin down, but the event definitely has brought money to Manhattan, said Becky Blake, director of Manhattan's Convention and Visitors Bureau.

"It does have a very significant impact," she said. "It's just been a great event, not just for Manhattan, but the entire area."

Blake said it was difficult to describe in dollars exactly what the economic effect was on the Manhattan area from the previous two Country Stampedes.

Liz Cunningham, marketing director for Country Stampede, said one way to forecast income from this year's event is to look at similar events of like maturity.

She compared Country Stampede to Country Jam in Eau Claire, Wis., a country musical event in its third year.

"There was a $6 to $8 million impact on the community," Cunningham said. This figure encompasses money spent not only at the festival but in the community and depends on what incomes are figured

Clinton brings town meeting to Kansas City

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Allen Kellin didn't expect to be surrounded by so many young people at Tuesday's presidential forum on Social Security.

But the 66-year-old maintenance worker from Kansas City was happy to see them.

"The youth, they're coming up in the world," Kellin said with a wide smile as he left the forum at Penn Valley Community College. "Me, I'm on my way out anyway. The young people need a break. A lot of them are going to need this Social Security."

CLINTON

Anyone who thought President Clinton's Social Security town meeting would be a debate only for graying seniors would have been surprised.

From fresh-faced teens and college students to 60- and 70-somethings, nearly all generations were well-represented at a forum that could eventually affect them all.

Clinton has said he wants Congress to undertake Social Security reform in 1999, well ahead of the unofficial deadline of 2029 — the year many say Social Security will dry up unless Congress acts.

Experts say an estimated 77 million baby boomers will retire within the next decade, swamping the system and slowly choking its ability to deliver on all its promised benefits.

"It's important to be here because I think the system won't be around unless we get together to talk about it," said 14-year-old Ben Carpenter, who attends Prairie Star Middle School in suburban Overland Park, Kan. Dressed in a coat and tie, he sat next to classmates who have spent recent weeks in school studying the issue.

Carpenter and the rest of the audience heard repeated examinations of such options as partially privatizing

Wefald reactivates e-mail account

CHRIS DEAN
Kansas State Collegian

A desire to continue being one of the nation's most wired universities has led President Jon Wefald to reinstate his e-mail account at pres@ksu.edu.

The e-mail account was put back online Monday after being inactive since Feb. 25.

It originally was removed at Wefald's request because of the amount of junk mail he was receiving.

WEFALD

"We just thought it wasn't doing as much good, because we got so much unwanted mail from listservs," Wefald said. "Just like 70 percent of your mail is promotions and ad campaigns and gets thrown away, 70 to 80 percent of the e-mail I was receiving had nothing to do with my office."

Wefald said one of the main reasons the e-mail address was reactivated was because of the April 2 Collegian editorial board, which asked for the e-mail account to be reinstated to foster communication with students and faculty.

"I respect the Collegian and the editorial board, and Student Publications selects leadership for Collegian, Royal Purple positions

The Board of Student Publications chose the 1999 Royal Purple editor and the summer and fall advertising managers and Collegian editors in chief Tuesday.

Jill Jarsulic, junior in print journalism and history, was selected as editor in chief of the Collegian for fall 1998. After six semesters on staff at the Collegian, she has several plans for the semester.

"I know we have a lot of good people, and I'm excited to be the one that leads them," she said. "I just really want the Collegian to get back to the fundamentals of strong reporting, striking photographs and well-designed pages."

Matt Bucher, senior in public relations and advertising, was selected as fall advertising manager. He said he would like to see some changes.

"I'd like to see more special sections that involve the students and faculty," Bucher said.

Bucher also said he would like to see an increase in communication between the advertising staff and the editorial staff.

Barbara Hollingsworth, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, will fill the 1999 Royal Purple editor position.

"My biggest goal for '99 is to improve our coverage," Hollingsworth said. "I think we have to do that by investing more time into developing longer stories and packaging information better.

"I'm really, really excited for next year, and we have a lot of staff returning."

Mary Renee Smith, sophomore in speech, was chosen to fill the summer editor in chief position for the Collegian.

"I have worked at the Collegian for more than 2 1/2 years," Smith said. "I'm looking forward to the challenges of being editor in chief of one of America's top college newspapers."

The summer ad manager position was filled by Chelsea Earhart. Like Bucher, Earhart was looking forward to changes and improvements.

Bucher and Earhart agreed they would like to continue the success established this semester.

"We all have a common goal," Bucher said.

Ron Johnson, director of Student Publications Inc., said this is one of the most crucial things the board does.

"The Collegian and RP are in very capable hands," Johnson said. "We are blessed with some great leaders and would like to thank all that applied for the positions."

Recent car burglaries primarily target stereos, compact discs left in automobiles

A small wave of six car burglaries hit Manhattan late Monday night and early Tuesday morning. Three of the six burglaries occurred in the Westchester Apartments.

Detective Ryan Runyan of the Investigations Division said the Riley County Police Department is investigating these incidents and said he believes most of the burglars are groups of juveniles and adults.

Runyan said burglars often walk around parking lots or on city streets with flashlights and look into parked cars for expensive items, including cellular phones, radar detectors, newer-looking stereo systems, purses and wallets.

Runyan said compact discs are among the more common stolen items because it doesn't take long for someone to take them to a pawn shop and exchange them for cash. He said there was a recent report in which more than 400 CDs were stolen from one car.

Runyan also said a lot of the stereos reported stolen are those with detachable faces that were left on. Detachable faces were designed to help prevent the theft of the stereo system.

Runyan said he urges people to take the proper precautions by placing high-dollar items out of sight.

"If anyone sees suspicious people walking around, looking in cars, call 911 or the police department at 537-2112," he said. "Report the incident, and we'll send a patrol officer to check out the situation."

Flatbed truck strikes school bus, injures 8 children; 2 remain in serious condition

CHAPPELL HILL, Texas — A flatbed truck hauling cars rear-ended a school bus Tuesday, tearing a hole into the backside of the bus and injuring at least eight children, two seriously.

The accident, involving a Brenham Independent School District bus, occurred about 4:30 p.m. near Chappell Hill, 60 miles northwest of Houston, said Mike Cox, a spokesman with the Texas Department of Public Safety.

The bus, its red lights flashing, had pulled over on a road near U.S. Highway 290 and was letting children off when the truck slammed into its rear left corner, Brenham school Superintendent Virginia Collier said. The left top corner of the bus was ripped, exposing the interior of the bus.

Twenty-five students, ages 6 to 18, were on the bus, Collier said.

Two girls, 15 and 16, were taken by helicopter to a Houston hospital. The younger girl was unconscious and in critical condition with a head injury. The second girl was in stable condition with a laceration to the back of her head and abdominal pain.

At least six students were treated for minor injuries at another hospital.

The male truck driver, whose name was not released, was taken to a hospital for evaluation. Authorities would not speculate about possible charges until an accident investigation was conducted.

Hall of Fame honors radio host Limbaugh

LAS VEGAS — Conservative talk radio host Rush Limbaugh was inducted Tuesday into the National Association of Broadcasters Hall of Fame.

As this year's radio inductee, Limbaugh received the association's highest honor. It was presented at the industry's annual convention.

Limbaugh began his nationally syndicated show in 1988. It was then carried on 56 stations. "The Rush Limbaugh Show" is now picked up by more than 600 stations, reaching 20 million people a week and is the highest rated national radio talk show in America, the NAB said, citing information from Talkers Magazine.

Limbaugh also is host of "The Rush Limbaugh Morning Update," a 90-second daily commentary.

Local tenants voice concerns about housing

ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

Manhattan public housing tenants spoke out about perceived unfair treatment by Manhattan Public Housing Authority at a public meeting Tuesday.

Mayor Bruce Snead and City Manager Gary Greer attended the meeting to listen to the complaints of Speak United, a group composed of public housing tenants and other low-income area residents.

Kay Glenn, a representative for the Manhattan Alliance For Peace and Justice, said she has been acting as a liaison between Speak United and the housing authority.

She said she first heard of complaints when she went door-to-door to talk with tenants about how to improve the community and public housing.

"I heard a lot of horror stories," Glenn said.

She said she went to the housing authority but didn't get a good response. That led to Tuesday's meeting between housing tenants and city officials.

Several tenants complained about how they have been treated by public housing officials.

Beverly Hutchins, a single parent with two children, said she was evicted because she was two days late with her rent, which was $26 plus a $10 late fee.

She said she tried to contact the housing authority to make payment arrangements, but she couldn't reach anyone.

"I've paid my rent every month except one month, and my housing was terminated," she said. "That was very low the way they done that.

"If this can help anybody on down the line to not go through what I've been through, then what I've been through has not been in vain," Hutchins said.

Valerie Hernandez, a 25-year-old who cares for her son and niece, also had concerns with the way authority representatives treated tenants.

She said they attempted to evict her on false accusations.

"They said I had someone living with me or was subleasing because I didn't check my mail on time," Hernandez said.

Hernandez said she also had lease violations for dirty dishes and clothes in the hallway. She said that is no reason for a violation, and the authority should try to better communicate their concerns.

"I'm a single parent, and my house isn't always up to par," she said. "I'm a human being. I can comprehend instructions."

Hernandez said she is trying to get out of public housing.

"I'm walking on eggshells, and I'm trying to find out right now where I can get the money to get a regular house," she said, "so that I don't have to deal with being treated like crap."

Tommie Youins, another resident of public housing, said residents are treated unfairly. The authority is more lenient with some residents than others, he said.

"Some people can do something and others can't," he said.

Authority director Jai Johnson, at whom many of the accusations were directed, said there was some truth to the accusations, but there are different views about what happened.

"The housing authority doesn't treat people unfairly," Johnson said, "but one case might be handled differently than another."

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

VALERIE HERNANDEZ, MANHATTAN RESIDENT, EXPLAINS THE DIFFICULTIES SHE IS ENCOUNTERING LIVING IN PUBLIC HOUSING TUESDAY AFTERNOON IN DOUGLAS CENTER. HERNANDEZ WAS NEARLY EVICTED ON FALSE ACCUSATIONS.

Johnson said she carries out the rules with kindness, respect and fairness.

"I try to communicate with them the best I can," she said. "Ninety percent of the time I am able to hear grievances, and we come to an agreeable solution."

Youins compared public housing to a concentration camp.

"Right now it's a concentration camp with a Nazi director," he said.

Not everyone at the meeting had complaints about public housing.

One resident said he had been treated with respect by public housing officials. He would not give his name.

"I've been treated very nicely," he said. "Every person who lives in public housing knows the grievances procedures and knows the rules and regulations and knows that they're supposed to help public housing help them."

He said he has been 15 days late with his rent before, but wasn't evicted.

"You want to know what's wrong with public housing? The people — that's what's wrong," he said. "Drug abusers, boozers, boom box cars, people with their music, dirt and filth. That's what's wrong with public housing."

Greer said he respected those who spoke at the meeting, and that some changes should be made.

"I want to make things better. I see some things that need to be changed," Greer said. "I see some good things. I see some bad things."

Greer said the accusations that public housing officials treated people unfairly and with disrespect were wrong.

"We treat everybody with respect. Period," he said. "And I won't settle for anything less."

He also said the authority had never evicted anyone for being two days late with rent.

Speak United members presented Greer and Snead with a list of 10 demands they wanted them to support.

These demands included making sure tenants' complaints were taken seriously and removing threatening language from general correspondence to tenants unless needed. It also included knocking and waiting to be acknowledged before entering tenants' homes and enforcing rules and regulations equally and fairly.

Greer said he couldn't support the demands without support from the city commissioners.

Snead said many of the demands were straightforward and should be easily implemented.

He also encouraged Speak United to work with the Public Housing Advisory Board to talk about issues and work things out.

"I think we can make improvements," Snead said. "What we want to see is effective housing, fair housing, housing that's the best Manhattan can offer for low- and middle-income people that need it."

Greer said if the city and Speak United work toward the goals of respect, love and safe conditions under which to live, they will be successful.

"I'm committed to doing that, and I'm committed to make this process work," he said.

Country Stampede should plan better this year

The Country Stampede organizers announced a star-studded lineup and a few notable changes. However, this summer's third-annual country music concert should concentrate more on better overall organization and providing additional safety features.

The threat of dangerous weather last summer left tens of thousands of fans without knowledge of a retreat route from the campgrounds or a designated shelter. With only one road out to the campsite at Tuttle Creek State Park and no buildings in the immediate vicinity, there needs to be somewhere for campers to find shelter in the event of a natural disaster.

A water system upgrade is already in the works. But with three months before the June 26-28 event, organizers also should be working on a way to make water more accessible within the concert area.

Last summer, water buffaloes — portable tanks of water — were placed far from the center stage and crowd paths. After the experience of two hot summers, a greater priority should be placed on access to water and use of water bottles within the fenced concert arena.

The addition of campsites and a pre-event concert has the potential to result in more fans. Organizers already are anticipating an average of 20,000 fans each day of the event. More fans in attendance should mean additional law enforcement and crowd-control personnel.

A little planning will go a long way in improving access to bathrooms and water. An evacuation plan for severe weather and additional safety professionals are also a great idea.

Country Stampede also has the potential to help Manhattan businesses. About between $6 million to 8 million is brought into the community because of this event. Perhaps the effect would be more direct if Manhattan businesses were able to serve as vendors on the campsite.

Most problems can be solved with common sense. If there are thousands of people outside in the heat, a few basic conveniences will improve the entire experience.

LONDON FOG: Its culture blankets the trend-setting city

VIEWPOINT

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

Russell is a fifth-year senior in architectural engineering. You can send e-mail to Russell at rmf@ksu.edu.

You could do much worse than a London park in the midst of spring. Daffodils, tulips and hyacinths litter mossy green lawns that glisten in the seemingly constant London mist.

Sitting on a bench in the park — be it the massive Hyde Park or the elegant, almost Parisian, Regent's Park — is the very best way to spend an afternoon in this infinitely bustling city. From this vantage point, it's easy to understand why it's been said to love London is to love the world.

Charles Dickens described a London full of "smoke lowering down from chimney-pots, making a soft black drizzle, with flakes of soot in it as big as full-grown snowflakes — gone into mourning, one might imagine, for the death of the sun."

Things have changed since the mid-19th century, and thanks mostly to air-pollution controls, the only "soft black" in London today is found in the local dress; it seems black leather everything is the must-have. Even Fergie was caught in a black leather mini two weeks ago.

London is hip — the global place to be, as Newsweek put it a year ago. It's also expensive, thanks to a strong pound and weak dollar. After a week in the city, New York is beginning to seem like a day out in Topeka.

Things in London are so hip, the queen has taken to the World Wide Web, and Prince Charles is entertaining Camilla Parker Bowles at the queen's home in Sandringham scandal-free. The royals haven't gotten off that easy — already critics in the London tabs are screaming the queen is turning a cold shoulder to Diana's memory by not planning some large memorial event for the first anniversary of the late princess's death in August. But who, short of Jesus Christ, could please the London press?

This isn't to say Londoners are cranks — quite the contrary. Aside from miserable table service while dining out, not much can be said against the rather polite and well-read average London resident. Even the planned multimillion-pound Millennium Dome in Canary Wharf — an architectural behemoth designed by architect Norman Foster to house exhibits for Britain for a new century — has elicited less public controversy as of late.

Construction can be found throughout the city, as bad, post-war, quickie 1950s architecture is removed for more appropriate designs. The British Museum will be completely overhauled to receive a grand new central court, a new building for parliament rises across from Big Ben's clocktower, the Tube (subway) continues its renovation of its cramped, dingy stations, and the Paternoster Square surrounding St. Paul's Cathedral is seeing new life with a complete renovation.

If all goes well, in two years London will begin the new millennium in a polished state that would be well imitated by Washington, D.C.

British culture has never been more in vogue in the states than it is now. Notice, for example, that no fewer than four of the five women nominated for best actress at the Academy Awards were English (though none won, owing more to American pride than common sense).

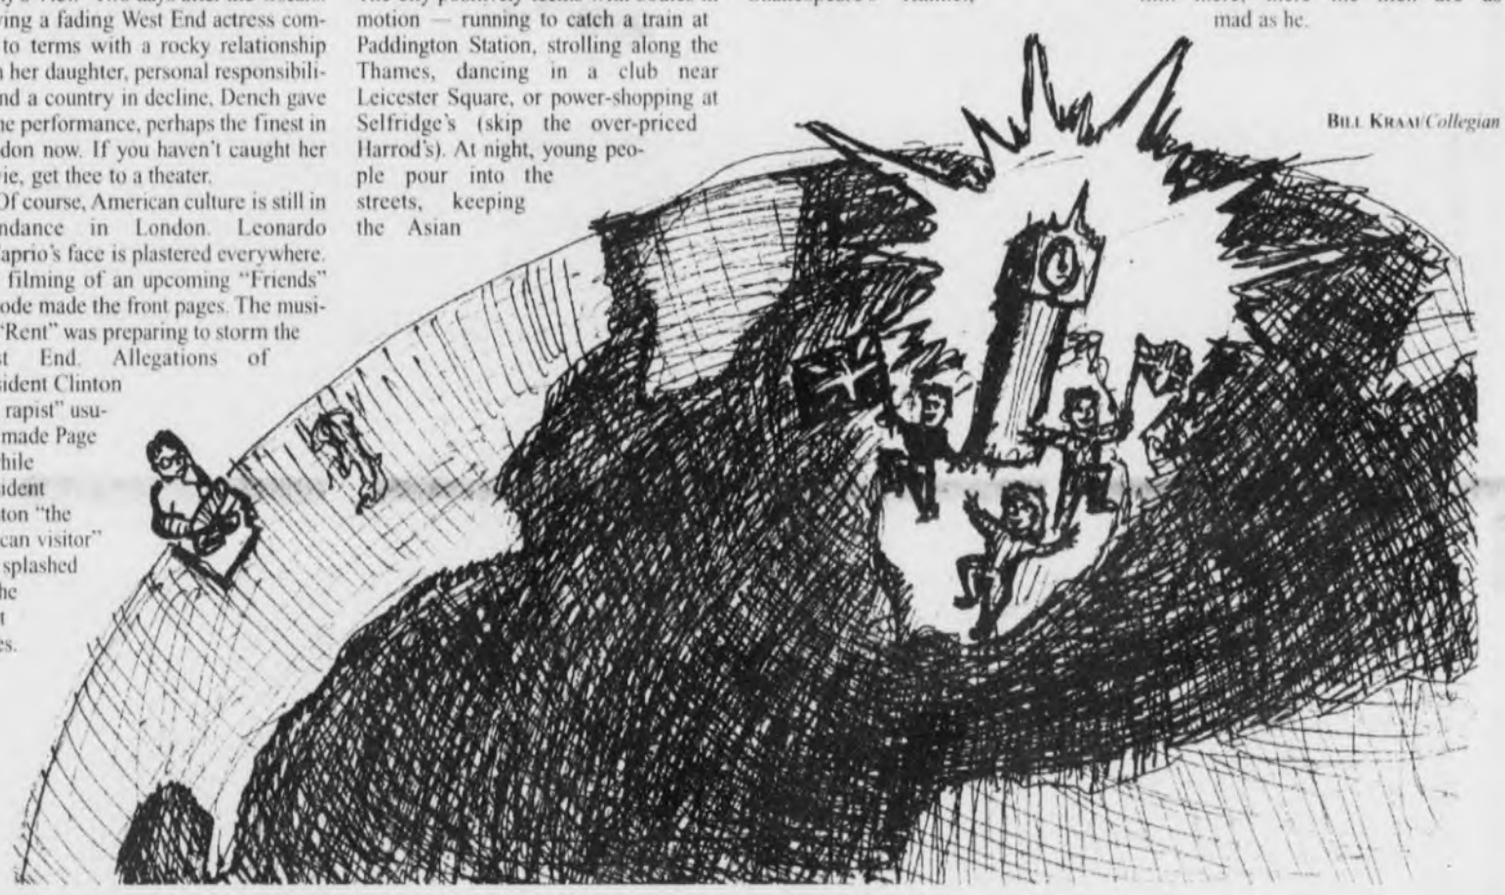
No matter. One of those actresses, Dame Judi Dench (nominated for "Her Majesty, Mrs. Brown"), returned gloriously to the London stage in the play "Amy's View" two days after the Oscars. Playing a fading West End actress coming to terms with a rocky relationship with her daughter, personal responsibility and a country in decline, Dench gave a fine performance, perhaps the finest in London now. If you haven't caught her movie, get thee to a theater.

Of course, American culture is still in abundance in London. Leonardo DiCaprio's face is plastered everywhere. The filming of an upcoming "Friends" episode made the front pages. The musical "Rent" was preparing to storm the West End. Allegations of President Clinton "the rapist" usually made Page 3, while President Clinton "the African visitor" was splashed on the front pages.

Prime Minister Tony Blair, England's version of President Clinton, seems to be following our dear president in every manner except infidelity. It's just been more than a year or so, and he's already become a Republican.

But what visitor pays much attention to printed matter when the real action in London is its varied and lively street life. The city positively teems with bodies in motion — running to catch a train at Paddington Station, strolling along the Thames, dancing in a club near Leicester Square, or power-shopping at Selfridge's (skip the over-priced Harrod's). At night, young people pour into the streets, keeping the Asian restaurants in the heart of the city open until at least 2 a.m., sometimes 4.

Do I love London because it's not Manhattan, or do I love it for less selfish reasons? Do I love it because I know all of this is going on as we speak and I can sleep, relatively speaking, in quiet Kansas — removed from the urgency of the city? Perhaps it's less tangible. Think Shakespeare's "Hamlet,"



Act 5, Scene 3. An unrecognized Hamlet approaches a gravedigger:

Hamlet: Ay, marry, why was he sent into England?

Gravedigger: Why, because he was mad: he shall recover his wits there; or, if he do not, it's no great matter there.

Hamlet: Why?

Gravedigger: 'Twill not be seen in him there; there the men are as mad as he.

Finding a good landlord is a tough job. Here are some helpful hints on how not to get stuck with the Lord of the Flies

VIEWPOINT

DAVID FAIRBANKS

David is a senior in electronic journalism. You can send e-mail to David at jollyd@ksu.edu.

Well, it's that time of year again. The weather's getting nice, the semester's end is fast approaching and herds of frantic students are searching for a place to live next fall. Ah yes, what a wonderful time it is.

This is the time when we are forced to listen to countless fabrications from every slumlord in town.

"Hey, don't worry about it. You'll get your deposit back if there's no new damage." This is what our summer '96 landlord said before he pocketed half of our deposit, due to what he called minor damage. Too bad it was there when we moved in.

"Oh yeah, the cost of utilities is really low in this house." This is what our landlord said about last year's house before we got our first KPL bill for more than $300.

"No, don't worry about those tiny cracks in the ceiling. They don't go all the way to the roof." That's what the same landlord told us before the first rain hit and we were forced to paddle through the living room.

This one's my favorite.

"It's a pretty good house. I think you'll like it." Yep, that was the same landlord talking about the same house. Maybe he should have come over during a cold spell to see us dressed in coats, gloves and stocking caps while watching television in our living room. Or maybe he should have come by when our own private "living room waterfall" formed right on top of us. Or maybe, just maybe, he could have stopped by when we found the remains of what appeared to be either a small dog or very large rodent in the middle of our basement floor.

But he never came by. And of course, I don't blame him. I don't think he would have liked to see his poor, wet, cold, confused tenants on their own turf. His remains might have ended up in the middle of our basement floor as well. I could see the future tenants now, having found his skeleton in the basement.

"Well, it's either the remains of a small anti-Christ or a very large scum."

Now, don't worry, everyone. I'm usually not this brash. It's just that I've dealt with too many fast-talking, promise-breaking, junk-peddling landlords in this town. Over the past three years, I've found, through trial and error, there are only a handful of trustworthy folk in the real estate business. Somehow, I stumbled across one of them last year.

Within days of talking to this guy, we were signing a lease on an incredible five-person house. This is where my roommates and I have been living the past two semesters. The roof has no holes, the KPL bills are decent, and we never found any skeletons in the basement. He fixes our stuff when we ask him, and he's even bent a couple rules for us from time to time. He's professional and very understanding. This guy even delivered us beer this weekend for keeping the house clean while he was showing it. He's a class act, and it's too bad you're not gonna find many like him in this town.

I'm talking him up so much because I'm sad he won't be our landlord anymore. Next year, because of our lack of roommates, we will be forced to move into a smaller house. I guess this is my way of telling him thanks.

OK, for all of you who are looking for a new place, I've compiled a list of things to look out for when dealing with Manhattan landlords.

1. Don't just take their word for it. Make sure if they promise you something they put it in the lease. Many times, if it's not on paper they'll just conveniently forget about it.

2. Make arrangements to get copies of bills. Many landlords will have utility bills sent to them, and they will send you a bill. Without a copy, some of them can overcharge tenants.

3. Don't ever let them just walk right in without announcing themselves. This is a common practice among inconsiderate, no-brained landlords. You are entitled to your privacy. If they invade it, let them know.

4. Don't be fooled by cheap rent. Many times, the rent is cheap because they are hiding something. Last year, in our case, they were hiding the huge KPL bills, the lack of insulation, the leaky roof and the portal to hell in the basement.

SHANE FOSBURG Collegian

5. If there's blood sprayed on the walls and a chalk outline of a person on the living room floor, I'd probably say no.

6. Ask as many questions as you can think of. Ask about the neighborhood, the possibility of flooding, the last people who lived there, why there's mouse pellets in the cupboards, average utility cost, if you can keep the paraphernalia in the closet of the master bedroom, the plumbing, their home phone number and anything else that comes to your mind. The more you ask, the more you'll know.

7. As a tenant, you are entitled to many unquestionable rights. Exercise them.

Good luck, and remember: the road to a good, honest landlord is littered with tons of bad ones. If you keep looking, you might just find one.

Drivers, pedestrians should use caution in busy crosswalks

Editor,

I have been reading with interest the continuing articles about campus crosswalk safety. I appreciate the many perspectives, yet I have to disagree with Scott Hopper's column. He said the university was responsible for the recent accident where Mindy Hines was injured.

That was unquestionably a tragedy everyone would like to see prevented. But it also should be clarified that responsibility for that tragedy falls primarily to those persons involved, the pedestrian and the driver of the vehicle.

I have a young child and long before he began solo treks to his school a block away, I began teaching him to look for cars before entering the streets. I think sometime between kindergarten and college, many of the students attending K-State have forgotten that all-important lesson. Few students crossing campus streets acknowledge the presence of vehicles around them, in spite of the obvious danger.

The human body will never win in a competition with any wheeled vehicle, be it a bicycle, car or truck. The person on foot should take every precaution when around vehicles, and this is magnified when light conditions are suspect. It is a fact that visibility is poor on streets at night, and headlights from oncoming traffic can add to that difficulty. We should not forget, however, that pedestrian/auto accidents occur in perfect light conditions, as well as low-light conditions.

Persons approaching a crosswalk should always check for traffic and make eye contact with drivers, if possible, before entering the crosswalk. Pedestrians also can take a few steps to improve their visibility at night. Reflective strips can be added to outer clothing and backpacks. Light-colored clothing worn by pedestrians easily can improve the ability to see them at night.

Responsibility primarily falls to the drivers and pedestrians who are sharing the same streets. Drivers of vehicles have a potential to inflict injury that should never be forgotten. Driving and walking defensively should be practiced at all times. People who are watching for danger will have more time to avoid accidents.

I am pleased to read that improvements will be made this summer to some crosswalks near campus. That is a step the community and university can take — now pedestrians and drivers need to do their parts and increase their awareness when they approach crosswalks.

City awaits decision on technical company's arrival

▶ 'PROJECT TECH' ADDITION WOULD INVEST $14 MILLION IN AIRPORT BUSINESS PARK.

KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

The Manhattan City Commission and Chamber of Commerce are waiting for a decision from a technical-related company to see if the company will accept the chamber's proposed $3.6 million investment package to bring its company to Manhattan.

The investment package was approved at last week's City Commission meeting unanimously.

The company, code-named "Project Tech," has asked for anonymity until it makes its decision. Project Tech would be the first addition to the new 189-acre business park near the Manhattan Regional Airport and would invest about $14 million in the park.

Ann Harts, director of economic development, said the company typically hires employees from communities in a 25-to 30-mile radius. The company has not promised the number of jobs it will offer, but typically the company averages about 430 work stations.

The incoming number of employees would allow the community to benefit economically both in the medical field and retail businesses, Harts said.

"If you look at the average employee count from this company of around 600 persons and the average salary of about $25,000 for a supervisor, you see that a lot of money will be put into the market," Harts said.

Harts said this company would further diversify Manhattan.

"It sets us up to be a player in the technical industry," she said. "And including K-State and Fort Riley it gives us the diversification we are seeking."

Another benefit of this company, Harts said, is that in other communities that house this company, a free training course at technical colleges has been set up by the company to anyone in the community. Individuals would be able to be trained for free and then could apply at the company for a job starting at $7 an hour.

Chamber President Dan Colantone said it is not unusual in economic development to work with a public or privately owned business confidentially.

"I think the key to this confidentiality is that the community leaders who are committing the investment of dollars be aware of this confidentiality so they can make a good decision," Colantone said.

Commissioner Karen McCulloh said despite the high investment package promised, this company is one of the best fits the commission has seen in the past few years.

The total investment to be made by the city is nearly $3 million, which includes site improvements to the park, tax abatement on personal and real property tax and miscellaneous fees, such as permits.

The state of Kansas also will add the remaining $590,000 from the Kansas Enterprise Investment Opportunity Fund, which allocates funds to companies relocating to Kansas based on the number of jobs provided.

"It's a good combination of the state and the local community," Colantone said.

The company also would receive training money and tax credit from the state. This money would not provide cash to the company right away, but it would be reimbursed in the future, Harts said.

The city's investment funds would be taken from the city's economic development fund, which is based on the half-cent sales tax that expires in December 1998.

Harts said the city does not know the future of a sales tax fund at this time but was not concerned that other incoming businesses to the park would not get adequate funding because of the high amount promised in this package.

If the company accepts the deal, Colantone said, it would accelerate the process for other businesses entering the business park.

"It puts in our first anchor," he said.

Harts said the hardest part in establishing a business park is getting the first tenant.

"It would be a wonderful first tenant," Harts said. "It sets the groundwork for other companies."

Harts said the city should hear back from the company by the beginning of next week but also still is working on other company packages.

The package has the full support of Mayor Bruce Snead.

He said it meets all the economic development goals, and this company has the potential for the highest number of jobs.

"The company wants to move quickly, and that is what makes it most attractive," he said.

"I'm not happy that we had to commit that much money, but I feel good about the commitment."

Students to demonstrate native dance from homeland as part of festivities

MIKE BURGESS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State students from the Democratic Republic of Congo will demonstrate native dance during International Night.

Serge Tubene, freshman in civil engineering and vice president of the Congolese Student Scholars of All North America, said they are going to perform a dance that a typical teen-ager or young adult would perform in Congo as part of the Cultural Show for International Night Saturday night.

COSSAM and many of the other international groups on campus will perform in the Cultural Show that is part of International Night. The show starts at 7 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium. Most of the acts will be dances, with performers in native dress.

The show is free and open to the public.

Tubene said before the current president, President Kabila, came into power, the Former President Mobutu was a dictator and musicians were not allowed to sing songs about what was happening in the country.

"The reason the musicians didn't have as much liberty was because they were living under a dictator regime. If they said anything bad about the president or the government, they would be in trouble," he said.

"The only way to stay out of trouble was to have songs that were not about politics."

Tubene said there is now more liberty for musicians and the rest of the people in the country.

Saturday night, the group of four will perform to a love song that he said could be described as rhythmic dance music.

"It's a modern form of dance, and it's called Dobomlo," he said.

"This dance came out five months ago in Congo. It was selected as one of the best dances for last year in Congo."

People grow up with the dances and don't take classes to learn how to dance, and each musician has his or her own style of dance, Tubene said.

"When the dance comes out, we go to the concert. We see the dance and copy it from the musicians. The musicians teach the dances to the general people."

The night will start with an international dinner at 5:30 p.m.

Deana Brown, senior in nutrition and exercise science and International Coordinating Council treasurer, said the chef specializes in Egyptian, Greek and Mediterranean dishes and the dinner will have a bit of everything.

The entrees for the dinner will be baked lamb with vegetables and slasel with tahini sauce and pita bread, a vegetarian entree with eggplant that is eaten like a sandwich. There will also be a vegetable tray, wild rice with raisins and dried onions, hummus and dolmatos, which are stuffed grape leaves. The desserts will include two types of cake, baklava and basbusa.

Tickets to the dinner are $7 and will be available from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Wednesday and Thursday at a table outside the K-State Student Union Stateroom. People can also get tickets at the International Student Center. Tickets will be sold in advance only.

Manuri Nakkawita, senior in advertising and International Coordinating Council president, said International Night is an opportunity to see fellow students in a completely different light as they perform in their international costumes.

"How many times per year do people get to see so many different nationalities being represented in one show?" she said.

Brown said students should come to the dinner to experience an international meal and traditional dance and song from other cultures.

"International Night gives you a taste and a glimpse of what else is out there in the world," she said.

K-State gets glimpse into life in African village in film coming to campus in conjunction with International Week

DIANA LEE
Kansas State Collegian

Although life in an African village is something most students might never experience, they can get a clearer idea of what it would be like by seeing the movie "Yaaba" at 7 tonight in Forum Hall. "Yaaba" is presented as part of International Student Week.

"Yaaba" is the story of a 12-year-old boy who befriends an old woman who has been shunned by the rest of the community as a witch. The film provides contrasts between the active village and the open plain, as well as between humans and nature.

"We knew that the African Student Association wanted us to help them get an African movie here, and this seemed like as good of time as any," Deana Brown, selection committee member, said.

Brown also said the film will give students a chance to see movies from places they might not otherwise see.

"We've tried to hit some of the countries that don't normally have a lot of their films shown or that the student organization from that country wasn't able to afford to bring a film in," Brown said.

The films also give students a chance to see life through eyes that aren't American, Brown said.

"These works are shot in other countries with their directors and actors. It gives people in this country their perspective, instead of an American one," she said.

Brown said they consider these films a window to another culture.

"We might not have the opportunity to travel to other countries and have experiences there, but we can have the experience of their cultures at home," she said.

Nausheen Kazi, coordinator for International Week, said she thinks these films give a different flair to the activities of the week.

"It's a good start to the whole night. It brings a different flair to what we're doing. These films are international but not well known," she said.

"It gives people a feel for our language and our customs."

Open Meetings Act subject to change in city

NATE JENKINS
Kansas State Collegian

Hoping to use a section in the state constitution that exempts many Kansas cities from provisions of the Kansas Open Meetings Act, the Manhattan City Commission on Tuesday approved first reading of an ordinance that would allow two commissioners to discuss city business outside of the public eye.

The ordinance would mark a historical change in how commissioners are able to discuss city business. In the past, it was illegal for any number of commissioners to meet and discuss city matters outside of public meetings, no matter how accidental the meeting was or how insignificant the topic of discussion.

As the law now affects the commission, a chance meeting of two commissioners in a grocery store and discussion of a road improvement issue technically would be illegal.

But that would change if the commission gave final approval to the ordinance, and as of Tuesday, four of the five voting commissioners support it. Mayor Bruce Snead said he supported the ordinance because it would improve the efficiency of public meetings and help the commission become more dynamic.

"It's hard for us to have synergy and creativity when we can't talk to each other about issues," Snead said. "There is an uncomfortable feeling that we can't talk about city issues when we run into each other, and this ordinance would allow us to talk if we feel that we want to."

The charter ordinance, which will require four votes to pass, would change the quorum number of the commission from three to four. A quorum is the number of members of a body needed to conduct official business. Kansas Open Meetings Act states that any meeting of a majority of a quorum has to be open to the public. Now, a meeting between two commissioners constitutes that majority and is illegal unless it is open.

The ordinance would change the commission's quorum to four, making a meeting of two commissioners legal behind closed doors. A larger meeting still would need to be open to the public.

The commission considered a similar ordinance in 1995, but there was too little interest and too much political turmoil in Manhattan for it to pass, Commissioner Steve Hall said. Junction City and Lawrence took advantage of the loophole provided in the state constitution, and meetings between some commissioners are now legal in those cities.

Only the first reading of the ordinance was approved by the commission Tuesday, and City Attorney William Frost assured commissioners they could take their time in developing a plan for how the quorum change could be implemented.

If the ordinance is approved by the commission, it would take effect unless a petition for a referendum is filed any time during a 61-day period after the last publication of the ordinance in The Manhattan Mercury.

City Commissioner Roger Reitz was the only vote against the first reading, but he said it wasn't because he is concerned commissioners would exploit any freedom the ordinance might create.

"The problem is that there will be the perception that there is skullduggery going on, even if there isn't," Reitz said. "The bottom line will be the public's perception of our actions, that we are going behind its back, even though we know that wouldn't happen."

Commission helps farmers with wheat marketing

AMY EBERT
Kansas State Collegian

Last year, Kansas wheat farmers produced a record 506 million bushels of wheat. The Kansas Wheat Commission helps those farmers market their wheat at a profitable level.

The commission is financed by a penny-per-bushel wheat tax that producers pay. David Frey, administrator of the Kansas Wheat Commission, said the commission worked from a $2.5 million budget last year.

"When a farmer sells a bushel of wheat in Kansas, there is a one-cent per-bushel tax that is collected at the initial point of sale," Frey said.

The commission has three main objectives or functions. The first is the expansion of overseas markets. The commission was formed with the initial task of working on foreign markets, Frey said.

"At the time we were established in 1957, we were growing too much wheat to be consumed in the United States, so we had an overseas market focus," Frey said.

Frey said the next objective was established with the goal of improving domestic consumption in the United States, with human nutrition being the focus point.

The commission helps fund Wheat Foods Council for the state. The council has a successful consumer nutrition education program, Frey said.

"We focus on the fact that nutrition experts say we don't consume enough grains, and we have been successful in working with nutrition leaders to increase domestic consumption," he said.

The third leg of the commission's objectives, Frey said, is the research aspect. Last year, the commission invested more than $200,000 to K-State wheat research.

"The dependence on public developed wheat varieties is tremendous in Kansas," Frey said.

Rollin Sears, professor of agronomy and K-State wheat breeder, is recognized nationwide for his work in variety development. Also recognized at a national level is Joe Martin, wheat breeder at the Agricultural Research Center in Hays, Kan. Frey said he works extensively in developing wheat varieties suited to the drier western Kansas climate.

Speaker tells how American Indians shape Kansas history

JENNIFER LUCKE
Kansas State Collegian

Raymond Farve, a Mississippi Choctaw and professor at Haskell Indian Nations University, spoke about American Indian history relating to Kansas.

American Indians were beginning to change their way of life when Christopher Columbus discovered North America, Farve said. They were starting to establish themselves into permanent groups.

Farve said the Plains were not well-traveled until the arrival of the horse with the Europeans.

Farve said the arrival of the horse was a changing point in American Indian history.

"If you look at oral histories of Indian tribes, most of them start with the horse because the culture totally changed," Farve said.

One area tribe, the Wyandots, immigrated to Kansas because the government relocated them, he said.

Farve said the federal government didn't check to make sure the land was not already occupied. The Wyandot tribe had to buy land from the Delaware tribe to establish a settlement at the meeting of the Kansas and Missouri rivers in an area that is now Kansas City, Kan.

The Wyandots eventually moved as a group to Oklahoma, although a contingent remained in Kansas. The Kansas Wyandots officially are recognized by the state, although not by the U.S. government, Farve said. In order to be recognized they would need to move to be with the main group.

The government only will recognize one group, so they have to come together, Farve said. Some groups have chosen not to do that.

"Some of those absentee groups are lucky enough to be recognized, but very seldom," Farve said.

Although the groups are not recognized, they are still in existence.

In the United States, 523 tribes are recognized, 180 are attempting to be recognized and 32 are still in existence but have been declared extinct, Farve said.

Another problem facing American Indians past and present is education.

In the 1880s American Indian children were removed from their families at age 6 and sent to boarding school for six to eight years, Farve said. The intention was to assimilate the young people. When the children returned to their homes they could not even speak their native language.

Farve said the practice continued for years.

"For a long time Indian parents never raised their children," Farve said. "Now they have children of their own and don't know what to do with them."

Most of these schools are now closed, although Haskell remains.

Farve said Haskell is still designed to assimilate American Indian students into American life and to do away with the reservation system.

It took 10 years to establish a class on contemporary American Indian issues, Farve said.

One of the problems at the college is the low graduation rate, Farve said.

Students enter the school in a class of 800 and are lucky to have 80 students walk across the stage to receive their associate's degree two years later, Farve said.

That is not a problem unique to Haskell, Farve said. Of 1,000 American Indian college students, only six will graduate.

Court denies right to broadcast arguments of McVeigh's appeal trial

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DENVER — Prosecutors lost a bid Tuesday to broadcast arguments on Timothy McVeigh's appeal in the Oklahoma City bombing to a closed-circuit TV audience in Oklahoma City.

The 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals denied the government motion without comment.

Under current court procedures, appeals are not televised and defendants are not permitted to attend.

"We regret the decision, especially given the praise from victims who followed the trial proceedings from Oklahoma City, but we'll work within the confines of the order to keep victims informed of the appellate proceedings," said Justice Department spokeswoman Chris Watney.

Oral arguments are scheduled April 28 on McVeigh's appeal of his conviction and death sentence in the April 19, 1995, bombing that killed 168 people and injured hundreds more.

Prosecutors asked the court to approve a closed-circuit telecast of the hearing, similar to the telecasts of the trials of McVeigh and Terry Nichols.

The proceedings were shown to bombing survivors and victims' relatives at a Federal Aviation Administration auditorium in Oklahoma City.

Court officials carefully screened those who were admitted to the auditorium.

The telecast was authorized by a federal law passed at the request of bombing victims who could not attend the trials because of space limitations in the courtroom and travel-related expenses.

Prosecutors said the same technology could be used to televise McVeigh's appeal.

"Closed-circuit transmittal of trial court proceedings in this case has had ... the very positive effect allowing bombing victims to observe our justice system at work, with no adverse impact on the trial. The interests of justice likewise would be served by allowing those same victims the opportunity to view the appellate argument," prosecutors said.

Defense attorneys argued that McVeigh, housed at the "Super Max" prison in Florence south of Denver, should be allowed to view a closed-circuit telecast of the hearing if the victims were afforded the same privilege.

"It is obvious that the class of persons who would directly benefit from the departure from standard procedures are closely aligned with the government, and will be hard-pressed to find justice in a decision from this court, which reverses Mr. McVeigh's convictions or the sentences recommended," the attorneys argued.

A decorated veteran of the Gulf War, McVeigh was convicted last year of murder, conspiracy and weapons-related counts in the bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building.

Nichols was convicted of conspiracy and eight counts of involuntary manslaughter.

He is awaiting sentencing.

One of the arguments in McVeigh's appeal is that victim testimony during the guilt phase of his trial could have played a significant role in the jury's decision to sentence him to death.

Yeltsin supports little-known prime minister nominee

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MOSCOW — President Boris Yeltsin took on his political opponents in a rare face-to-face meeting Tuesday, coaxing them to accept his nominee for premier but rejecting their demands for a coalition government.

In a sumptuous, white-columned hall, Yeltsin sat at a round table with more than 20 political leaders and explained why a 35-year-old government novice is the best choice for Russia's next prime minister.

"Let's approach this objectively, not from political considerations," Yeltsin said, his voice echoing in the high-domed chamber. "Let's look at the man from a business and professional point of view. And if he can do the job — let's move on."

Two weeks ago, Yeltsin fired the government and elevated the little-known Sergei Kiriyenko to acting prime minister.

A few days later, he made Kiriyenko, who had been in government less than a year, his formal nominee for the post.

Parliament, which is controlled by Communists and other Yeltsin opponents, has given Kiriyenko a cool reception, saying he is too inexperienced to lead the government. It has pressed for a coalition government — an option Yeltsin flatly rejected.

"In no way — and I ask you not to say it ever again — have I agreed to a coalition government. No, no," Yeltsin said. "We must have businesslike people in government."

After postponing a confirmation vote last week, parliament Tuesday formally scheduled the vote for Friday — a day after a nationwide labor protest is scheduled to vent popular anger at economic reforms.

Yeltsin, with Kiriyenko at his side, told the Kremlin gathering he made his choice after considering several other candidates, including Moscow's populist mayor, Yuri Luzhkov, and Federation Council speaker Yegor Stroyev.

He said he chose the best candidate and urged parliament not to delay confirmation.

Yeltsin also said he was ready to ease the climate of confrontation between the president and parliament that has stalled so much government business.

"I don't veto, you don't reject. Let's try it," Yeltsin said.

Originally, Yeltsin threatened to disband parliament if it rejected Kiriyenko. But the Kremlin meeting Tuesday was part of a more conciliatory approach he began last week.

Still, parliament leaders — lawmakers from the lower house and regional representatives and trade union leaders from the upper house — indicated the president's cajoling had done little to change their previous positions.

Communist leader Gennady Zyuganov said his faction still plans to vote against Kiriyenko.

Russia needs a well-known person who has a lot of political authority and experience in running government, Zyuganov said.

Others saw the meeting as a way to start political horse-trading. Ultranationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky told reporters he would support Kiriyenko if Yeltsin includes two or three of his party members in the new Cabinet.

For his part, Kiriyenko sounded optimistic about his chances for confirmation. He said he would not trade ministerial seats for parliamentary support.

Despite their public rhetoric, many Duma leaders have indicated they would rather accept Yeltsin's choice than risk early elections.

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Kansas City Chiefs signed 11 free agents Tuesday, including five-year veteran wide receiver Marcus Dowdell.

Dowdell has 37 catches for 466 yards and three touchdowns in 41 games with the New Orleans Saints and Arizona Cardinals. Dowdell, 27, has averaged 7.1 yards on 47 punt returns and 22.5 yards on 23 kick returns.

Dowdell was a 10th-round draft choice of the Saints out of Tennessee State in 1992.

Also signed by the Chiefs were Voshone Adams, safety, three-year veteran, Eastern Michigan; James Bostic, running back, three years, Auburn; Reggie Clark, linebacker, three years, North Carolina; Herb Coleman, defensive end, one year, Trinity; Matthew Dorsett, cornerback, three years, Southern; Hicham El-Mashtoub, center, three years, Arizona; Sean Manuel, tight end, two years, New Mexico State; Kavis Reed, cornerback, one year, Furman; Greg Robinson, running back, four years, Northeast Louisiana; and Rod Thomas, cornerback, rookie, Southern Mississippi.

Royals drop home opener 11-7

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Joe Carter drove in four runs, and Eric Davis and Lenny Webster homered as Baltimore won its sixth straight, beating Kansas City 11-7 Tuesday in the Royals' home opener.

Roberto Alomar had four hits as the Orioles improved to 6-1 for the fourth time ever. Their only loss was 4-1 to the Royals on opening day.

Scott Erickson (2-0), who beat the Royals and Glendon Rusch 10-1 at Baltimore last Wednesday, took an 8-1 lead into the sixth but was removed with one out in what wound up as a five-run inning. Erickson allowed five runs and 10 hits.

Before 40,419, the Royals' largest crowd for a home opener since 1988, Rusch (0-2) gave up six runs and 10 hits in five-1/3 innings. He had a 1-0 lead before Webster hit his third homer leading off the fifth, his second of the season off Rusch. Two-out singles by Jeffrey Hammonds, Davis and Raphael Palmeiro put Baltimore ahead, and Joe Carter followed with a two-run single.

Hammonds hit a sacrifice fly in the sixth, and Davis hit a three-run homer off Jim Pittsley later that inning for an 8-1 lead.

Jeff King, who had an RBI single in the first, hit a two-run homer on an 0-2 pitch from Terry Matthews to cap the Royals' five-run sixth. Johnny Damon had an RBI double and Jose Offerman chased Erickson with a two-run single.

Dean Palmer hit Matthews' first pitch in the seventh for his third homer, pulling making the score 8-7.

Carter's hit another two-run single in the eighth and Matt Whisenant walked Palmeiro with the bases loaded.

TWA Dome selected as site of 1998 Big 12 Championship

DALLAS — The Big 12 football championship will return this year to the site of the inaugural conference title game at the Trans World Dome in St. Louis.

"It's a great city, and the facilities are great," Big 12 Commissioner Steve J. Hatchell said Tuesday, adding that the supportive city and its hotels helped make the 1996 game a success.

The title game moved to San Antonio last season. This year's game is Dec. 5.

BIG 12 XII CONFERENCE

Texas defeated Nebraska 37-27 in the first Big 12 championship at St. Louis. The game fell short of capacity attendance, although it produced $500,000 in additional revenue for conference schools.

The winner of this year's game, to be televised by ABC Sports, will again represent the league in the Bowl Alliance.

"We had a really good experience in St. Louis in 1996," said Donnie Duncan, Big 12 senior associate commissioner.

"They have a tremendous facility there. It's A-plus and all of the pieces fit. The rationale was solid and it all worked out in terms of the negotiations, the potential revenue strengths and ticket locations."

The Dome, home to the NFL's St. Louis Rams, has more than 65,000 fixed seats plus more than 6,000 club level seats, with 109 luxury suites.

In February, athletics directors reviewed operational results of the first two Big 12 football championships in considering plans for future contests.

Directors reviewed financial packages, scheduling and choices of venues for this year's football championship.

Tom Stanton of Baylor, director of athletics chairman, commended Duncan for making arrangements for this year's championship.

"The football championship game is a rare opportunity for national championship quality football to be played in St. Louis," said Bob Bedell, president and chief executive of the St. Louis Convention and Visitors Commission.

In 1996, Dr Pepper/Cadbury North America signed a four-year agreement to become title sponsor of the Big 12 football championship.

With 18 of 22 starters returning, questions surrounding the 1998 Wildcat football team might, on the surface, seem unnecessary. But the holes that need filling are big ones, literally.

As first-team All-Big 12 offensive linemen Todd Weiner's and Kendyl Jacox's eligibility expired, so did some of the line's size. Both players weighed in at more than 300 pounds. Coach Bill Snyder said replacing the linemen will be a big issue for the coaching staff.

"Our first concern will be the offensive line, at center," Snyder said. "Also the interior defensive line and cornerback."

Three sophomores — Ryan Cummings (6-4, 280 pounds), Randall Cummins (6-3, 260 pounds) and Milford Stephenson (6-3, 260 pounds) — will jockey for offensive line positions. Stephenson, who moved from tight end, will compete with Cummins for center, while Cummings could take over at left tackle.

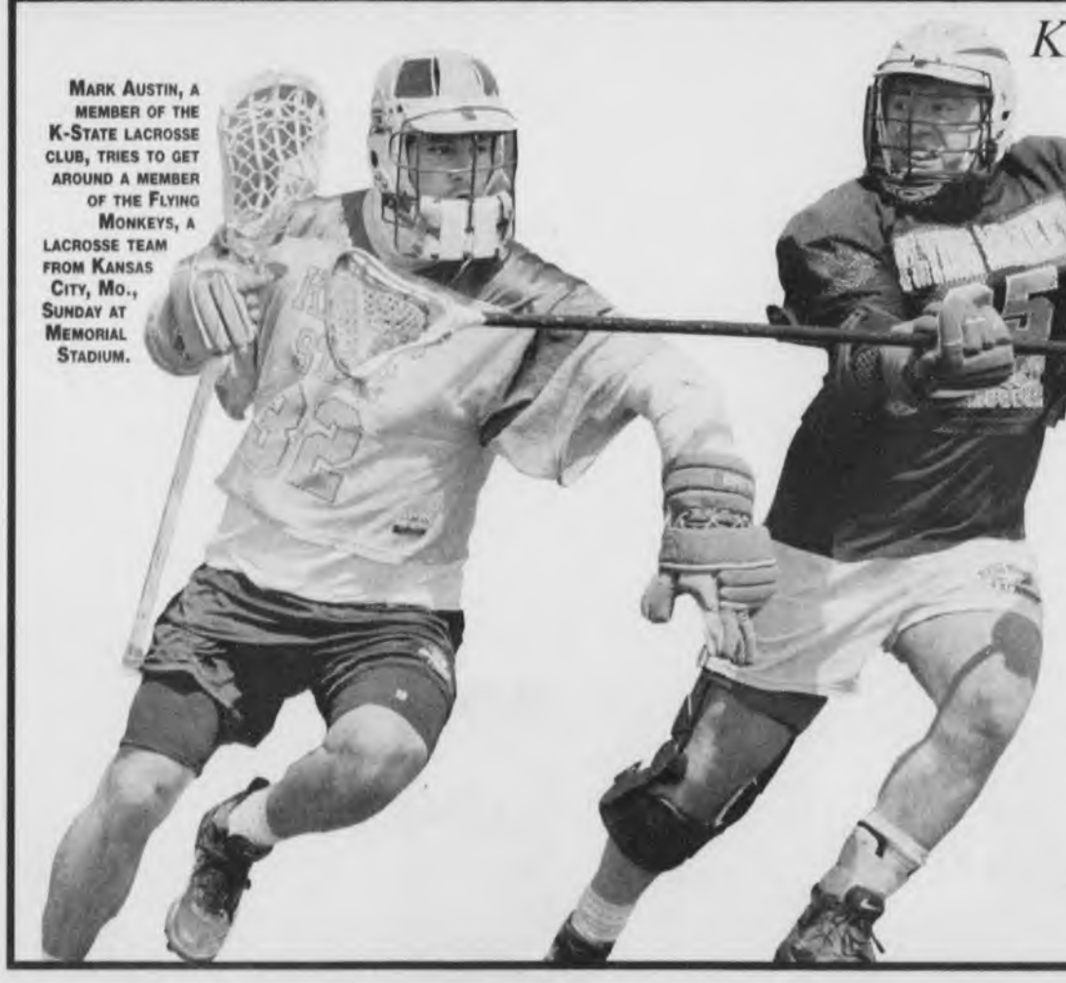
Although the only loss on the defensive line is second-team all-Big 12 player Jerome Evans, he was listed in a three-man rotation with senior Andrae Rowe and junior Damion McIntosh. McIntosh, who started the 1997 season opener at right tackle when senior Ryan Young missed for illness, possibly will see time on both sides of the ball during the spring.

Cornerback Demetric Denmark is the only starter lost to the defensive backfield, but Snyder said he is concerned about improving the secondary's coverage skills in 1998.

Sophomore Adrian Beard, initially slated to start at corner in 1997, left the first game with a season-ending injury. Snyder said Beard will practice full-contact this spring.

Sophomore Dyshod Carter started nine games at the short-side corner. Seniors Gerald Neasman and Keith Black all have experience at the position and will compete with redshirt freshman Jerametrius Butler and community college transfer DeRon Tyler for the job.

Snyder said another injured Wildcat, sophomore linebacker Turelle Williams, will practice this spring and is expected to back up junior Mark Simoneau. But senior linebacker Travis Ochs will not practice. Ochs had surgery on his shoulder during the off-season.



The No. 2 concern for the Cats lies in the depth chart, Snyder said.

"We need to establish the experience factor of the two-deep across the board," Snyder said. "We

Championship hopes take hit

K-State lacrosse club loses 11-7 in possible championship preview

Mark Austin, a member of the K-State lacrosse club, tries to get around a member of the Flying Monkeys, a lacrosse team from Kansas City, Mo., Sunday at Memorial Stadium.

As the saying goes, "Always a bridesmaid, never a bride."

That must be how the K-State lacrosse club feels after losing its home opener Sunday against the Flying Monkeys, a team from the Kansas City, Mo., area, by an 11-7 score. The loss moved K-State's record to 1-1 on the season.

Jay Sweet, club president and head coach, said K-State always has a good team, but in its nine-year history, the Wildcats never have brought home a title from the Great Plains Lacrosse League.

"I think there's still a good possibility that we can win it all," Sweet said. "If we continue to play together and do the basic things like cradling (the ball) and catching, we have a chance."

In the past, K-State has had the habit of beating a team in the regular season, only to lose to the same team when the playoffs roll around. Members said they hope to turn the tables on that trend this season.

The Flying Monkeys are the top team in the league, Sweet said, and even though K-State lost, he was encouraged with the team's play.

"We played terribly in the first half," Sweet said. "The three 'D' guys had never played together before in a game. They're a lot older team, a lot more experienced, a lot more relaxed."

The lack of experience enabled the Flying Monkeys to take a big early lead. After the Cats settled down, they started to play better, but the cushion the Flying Monkeys had was too large to overcome. At halftime, K-State was down 9-3.

Sweet, who has more experience than most players on the club, said he nearly put himself in on defense, but that wouldn't have been the best move for the team.

"I knew that in the long run, I needed these guys to play together," he said. "In the second half, they were just great.

Designated-hitter rule in baseball simply giving more offense to game

VIEWPOINT

Byron Vogel

Byron is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Byron at byronv@ksu.edu.

Baseball is a simple game. You throw the ball. You hit the ball. You catch the ball.

At least it used to be that way until Ron Blomberg became the major league's first designated hitter in 1973. Now, for a DH, baseball has become even simpler: You eat some cheese fries. You hit the ball. You eat some more cheese fries.

Fortunately, this less-than-strenuous regimen might not last much longer. Baseball team owners have notified the players' union of the possibility the DH will not exist in 1999. The DH is a part of playing rules, and owners said they can therefore phase it out without first receiving approval from the players' union.

Bad news for players, but good news for baseball.

Players want to keep the DH for obvious reasons. First, the rule is responsible for the employment of 14 players — one for each American League team — and there's little chance Donald Fehr and the players' union willingly would sacrifice those jobs.

The rule allows crusty veterans, such as Chili Davis and Cecil Fielder, to earn between $3 million and $7 million a season when they otherwise would be worthless. Artifacts of the mid-1980s such as Harold Baines and Eddie Murray, who are more suited for the AARP than the major leagues, play well past their primes thanks to the DH.

Worst of all, the DH singlehandedly creates Hall of Famers. Of the players who have reached 3,000 career hits during this decade, only Robin Yount did so minus the aid of the DH rule. Neither Dave Winfield, Paul Molitor nor George Brett would have achieved that milestone were their careers dependent upon their ability to play defense. Spectacular careers notwithstanding, these players' lifetime stats should be accompanied by asterisks the size of baseballs when compared with those of their Cooperstown contemporaries.

Such a move by the owners would be good for baseball on even more fronts. The American League's big-thunder offensive philosophy has left the junior circuit totally devoid of the strategy that all big-league managers used to invoke. In the National League, managers play for the run. If the lead-off hitter gets on base, the No. 2 man bunts him into scoring position. An NL team can send half its lineup to the plate and see a total of only six pitches from the opposition.

When was the last time you saw Roberto Alomar or Alex Rodriguez bunt? With their brand of smash-mouth baseball, AL teams play for the six-run inning. A typical lineup card might feature one hitter who doesn't bring the house on every swing. As a result, ERAs are higher, and games progress more slowly.

Sure, AL games are longer, too, but it's the glacial pace of the contests that make them unbearable. With AL lineups stacked from top to bottom, pitchers avoid home plate like the plague. They go deep into the count in hopes of getting the big guns to chase bad pitches. Innings drag on longer than an episode of "The Young and the Restless." (The refusal of AL umpires to enforce the strike zone doesn't help much, either.)

Contrary to popular belief, the last thing baseball needs is more offense. Any time Brady Anderson hits 50 dingers in a season, or a 4.86 ERA automatically qualifies you as your team's ace, it's usually a good indicator that the big leagues aren't hurting for run production.

What baseball does need is credibility. With players rejecting $10 million-a-year contract offers and owners dismantling world-champion teams, fans are looking for any excuse to walk away from baseball for good. It's difficult to maintain credibility when Terry Pendleton is still in the majors by virtue of the designated hitter rule.

You throw the ball. You hit the ball. You catch the ball. It's baseball the way it ought to be.

Of course, if guys such as Davis and Pendleton insist on hanging around the game until they're 80, maybe they should look into employment at ballpark concession stands. Rumor has it they serve up some great cheese fries.

LENA PILIPTCHAK PLAYS EN ROUTE TO A TENNIS VICTORY AGAINST THE UNIVERSITY OF MISSOURI ON TUESDAY AFTERNOON IN AHEARN FIELD HOUSE.

K-State sweeps Missouri 3-0, Dorodnova takes day of rest

DAN CATALDI
Kansas State Collegian

The future of K-State tennis shone brightly Tuesday as three freshmen led the way in a 9-0 sweep over the Missouri Tigers.

Senior Yana Dorodnova, K-State's No. 1 player, was given the day off after a pair of weekend meets against Oklahoma and Oklahoma State. This gave Coach Steve Bietau a chance to move everybody up in the lineup.

That left the top three positions in the singles lineup to freshmen.

Anna Pampoulova made her debut at the No. 1 singles position with a 6-4, 6-1 victory over Joni Jordan despite being a little nervous.

"At the beginning, I was kind of nervous," Pampoulova said. "But then I started playing what I had been practicing for the last wee, and it went pretty good."

This was evident as the first set was close at 5-4 before Pampoulova took control of the match by winning seven of the past eight games to close out Jordan.

Bietau also said Pampoulova was able to demonstrate what she had been practicing recently.

"I thought Anna played very well today," he said. "She has made a lot of progress in the last week."

The rest of the Wildcats lost only one game among them in the remaining singles matches.

The other freshmen in the lineup, Martina Pospisilova at No. 2 and Eva Novotna' at No. 3, both had convincing wins as well.

Two seniors anchored K-State. No. 4 Lena Piliptchak and No. 5 Dinah Watson both coasted to 6-0, 6-0 wins.

In doubles play, the freshmen occupied three of the four spots in the two matches that were played. Both players on the No. 1 team for K-State were freshmen.

Piliptchak sat out the doubles match with her usual partner at the No. 1 spot, Dorodnova.

Novotna' and Pospisilova moved up from their typical spot at No. 2 into the No. 1 position. After struggling at the beginning of the match, they pulled away at the end to an 8-3 win over Jordan and Andrea Friedman.

At No. 2 doubles, Pampoulova and Watson also jumped up a spot to No. 2, where they cruised to an 8-1 win over the Tigers' tandem of Audra Clemons and Jamie Hunt.

Despite the easy victories at doubles, Bietau said he saw the need to get better.

"We've got some work to do in those doubles," he said. "Even though we won that match, I wasn't satisfied that we played anywhere close to as well as we can."

The Tigers only were able to field a team of five players, and therefore, were forced to forfeit both the No. 6 singles and No. 3 doubles matches.

This victory runs the Cats' record to 8-10 overall and 4-5 in the Big 12, with just two conference meets remaining.

The team closes out its home schedule Monday with a meet at 1 p.m. against Baylor at the L.P. Washburn Recreational Area near the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

have the depth, but not experienced depth. We will work to get those guys positive, usable experience."

To the fan, these things might seem easy with such an experienced group of starters. The main focus mentally will be staying focused and staying away from complacent thoughts, Snyder said.

"That is what we as coaches need to be able to communicate with each other," he said. "We have younger players in our program that may not understand that."

This could become a problem when those younger players come into a team that sits in the preseason top 10 and is being discussed as a possible national champion contender. Snyder said he isn't unhappy about the preseason accolades and doesn't see them as pressure.

"I don't think it's a bad thing," he said. "I don't think Florida State or Nebraska would deny or show disappointment about being ranked really high. We just accept it, but we all understand it won't mean a hoot right now or in September."

> "WE HAVE TO CONCENTRATE ON EACH GAME AND THE LITTLE THINGS."
> senior offensive guard

As far as looking to the older players to shake the complacent feelings, Snyder said he'd like to do that, but there aren't many fifth-year seniors or fourth-year juniors to look to. The team will rely on every single player understanding the concept of not losing sight of what the team's focus is, he said.

"There is a saying that a roadblock is something you trip over when you lose sight of the road," he said. "We need to pay attention to the goal and not trip over all the things on the way to getting there."

Senior offensive guard Jeremy Martin said he's already thinking that way.

"We have to focus not on big goals like the Big 12 Championship," Martin said. "We have to concentrate on each game and the little things."

High-ranking university source says Bender to fill vacancy at Texas

ASSOCIATED PRESS

AUSTIN — Washington coach Bob Bender has emerged as the front-runner for the head basketball coaching job at Texas, said a high-ranking university source.

Bender, 40, met with Texas officials in Dallas on Tuesday on his way back from vacationing in Florida.

The source, who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity, said the job hadn't been offered to anyone as of late Tuesday afternoon.

But the source added that Bender had moved to the top of Texas' short list after school officials became concerned about what it would cost to land Utah's Rick Majerus, who last week turned down a reported annual salary of just more than $1 million at Arizona State.

Texas athletic director DeLoss Dodds has said the basketball coach won't be paid more than football coach Mack Brown, who makes $750,000 annually.

"You have to consider the guy (Majerus) just because of what he's done at Utah," the source said, referring to the Utes' appearance in this year's national championship game.

But Bender's ability to turn programs around at Illinois State and Washington, his pedigree as a former assistant to Duke coach Mike Krzyzewski and his engaging, easygoing personality appear to have won Texas officials over.

Unlike former Texas coach Tom Penders and Majerus, who have reputations for speaking their minds, regardless of what university administrators might think, Bender fits Texas' buttoned-down image as a company man.

He also fits the Longhorns' budget, making around $350,000 at Washington, which is well below the $550,000 that Penders made annually.

"Bender is a solid citizen who can coach," the source said.

Bender's record at Washington is 68-72, but has improved each of his five years in Seattle, culminating with a 20-10 season and a Sweet 16 appearance in the NCAA Tournament this year.

Bender's wife, Alice, reached at their home in Seattle on Tuesday night, said, "If the job is offered, Bob won't do anything before the Washington team banquet on Thursday. Bob really doesn't want to take away from that.

"He won't make a decision without talking to me and without seeing Austin, and we haven't done that," she said.

Majerus, 50, meanwhile told the Deseret News in Utah that he wouldn't comment on whether he was interested in the Texas job.

"I'm not going to comment on other jobs in the press, ever," Majerus said. "I'm just tired of it all. I don't feel I owe the press anything. You'll notice nothing ever comes out of me."

While Majerus refused to say what his intentions are, he did give a few clues.

Majerus said he has not been in Texas since he left San Antonio last Wednesday and has no plans to go there the next couple of days.

He said he planned to go to a movie with a friend on Tuesday night and to leave Wednesday for Phoenix, where ex-Ute Michael Doleac will participate in a pre-NBA draft training camp.

Penders resigned last week as head coach at Texas after a month of controversy that began when four young players went Dodds on March 8 to complain about playing for Penders.

K-State lacrosse club loses to Flying Monkey Lacrosse Club

They were forcing guys away from the goal and not giving them the easy shots they had in the first half."

Sweet even partially blamed himself for the loss. The game was his first as head coach, and he said he made some bad decisions.

As the home team, K-State had the option of choosing a running clock for the quarters or having it stop every time there was a stop in play. Sweet chose to use a running clock, a decision he regretted in hindsight.

"We had more players than they did, and maybe if I had not chosen a running clock, we would have had more time and worn them out," he said.

K-State played much better in the second half, allowing only two goals. The team went on a 5-0 tear that was interrupted by halftime.

"I'm really pleased with how we played in the second half," Sweet said. "We started using the skills we were supposed to develop."

K-State couldn't come up with enough offense to recover from the halftime deficit, though, and ended up a few goals short of victory.

But the team's second-half play proved the team can compete with the best, and the team said it hopes it can come back to win the first lacrosse championship for K-State.

The club is back in action at 3 p.m. April 18, when K-State will be host to Rockhurst College at Memorial Stadium. Admission is free.

Graves announces tax relief plan

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Gov. Bill Graves said some folks are a little stunned by the magnitude of a quarter-billion dollar tax-relief plan he unveiled Tuesday.

GRAVES

However, he said, it can be funded because of soaring state revenues, and legislators are going to be hard-pressed not to vote for it.

"This tax package has everything in it," Graves said at a briefing after he outlined it to legislative leaders.

"Just about everything anyone has asked for this session is in the package. I think this is a plan a lot of people will be inclined to vote for."

House leaders quickly embraced the governor's new tax package, which is $27 million bigger than one the House passed on Feb. 18 on a vote of 122-1.

"We can pass it in 10 minutes," said Rep. Phill Kline, R-Shawnee, chairman of the House Taxation Committee.

But Senate leaders took a more muted and skeptical approach to the plan. Senate President Dick Bond, R-Overland Park, said it would be reviewed by the Senate GOP caucus Wednesday before the Legislature reconvenes after a four-day recess.

Sen. Dave Kerr, R-Hutchinson, chairman of the Senate Ways and Means Committee, was blunt in his criticism of the governor's proposal.

"I don't agree with the governor's spending package, nor with his tax package," Kerr said. "I don't know why he did it. He is unnecessarily risking financial difficulties in the out years (beyond the next fiscal year). It presents risks we don't need to take."

Graves conceded his proposal to cut taxes $251.8 million and enhance spending — all for education — over what he previously proposed by $22.5 million is bold.

But he said if revenues come in as projected the state can afford the tax cuts and increased spending, while fully funding existing programs and maintaining a legally required 7.5 percent general fund balance.

The governor said he proposed the aggressive tax reduction plan to try to get the House and Senate together on a tax cut bill that has been stalled in a conference committee for weeks.

That committee might meet again Wednesday.

The Legislature returns for three days of final work to conclude the regular portion of the 1998 session, then takes a recess before coming back on April 29 for a scheduled four-day wrap-up session.

The new Graves proposal is 48 percent higher than the $170 million package he proposed when the session opened in January.

The increase is the result of ever-burgeoning state tax collections, which last week caused the Consensus Estimating Group to raise revenue projections through fiscal year 1999 by nearly $190 million.

A key feature of Graves' new plan is reduction of the statewide property tax levy to 20 mills from the present 27 mills, at a cost in reduced revenue of $70.5 million.

The plan also would raise the personal income tax exemption to $2,250 from $2,000, costing $36.3 million; conform the state's inheritance tax to the federal estate tax, $30.5 million, and equalize income tax rates between married and single taxpayers, $23 million.

Graves previously proposed taking the school mill levy — begun in 1992 to help finance kindergarten-through-12th grade education and once at 35 mills — down to 23 mills from 27 mills where it is now.

Other significant pieces of the package include eliminating the sales tax collected on remodeling services on residential property, $14.7 million; equalizing the standard deduction on state income taxes at $3,000 per person for both singles and married couples, $18.4 million, and allowing companies a 15 percent refundable tax credit for property taxes paid on machinery and equipment, $16 million.

Also included is an earned income tax credit for the working poor equal to 10 percent of the federal EITC, at a revenue loss of $12.6 million, and expanding the food sales tax rebate program for the poor by $13.4 million — two components Democrats have been pressing hard for.

Graves also proposed raising the base state aid per pupil to $3,720 from the present $3,670, costing $8.5 million; expanding the amount of state aid going to high-enrollment schools, the so-called correlation weighting, by $10 million; and spending $4 million more on programs for infants, toddlers and 4-year-olds who are at risk educationally.

He put no money in to finance a House-developed plan to restructure the governance of higher education, signaling that proposal is likely dead in the Senate for this session.

"That's an issue the Senate leadership is going to have to decide how they want to proceed," Graves said. "The speaker still feels very strongly about the effort. But I think with six days remaining in the session, the emphasis on tax relief makes it unlikely anything is going to happen on that."

Hustler publisher indicted for selling obscene videos

▶ FLYNT BROTHERS FACE 15-COUNT INDICTMENT FOR PANDERING OBSCENITY.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CINCINNATI — Hustler magazine publisher Larry Flynt, who beat obscenity charges more than 20 years ago, was indicted Tuesday on more serious charges of selling obscene videotapes to a 14-year-old boy.

The 15-count indictment against Flynt and his brother includes charges of pandering obscenity.

Flynt was convicted of that charge in 1977 for distributing Hustler in Cincinnati.

The conviction — detailed in the 1996 movie "The People vs. Larry Flynt" — was thrown out, and Flynt was never retried.

But Tuesday's indictment also includes the charges of engaging in a pattern of corrupt activity and conspiracy to engage in a pattern of corrupt activity. Those charges carry possible penalties of two to eight years in prison, compared with a maximum year for a pandering obscenity charge.

The charges cite videos sold in Flynt's downtown bookstore.

"I'm not going to say whether Hustler is obscene," prosecutor Joseph Deters said. "This is about videos. He can sell whatever he wants. But if he sells obscene videos, obscene materials, he will be prosecuted."

Flynt said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press he did not know the circumstances of the alleged sale to the boy, but doubts he could be convicted for it because he was in California at the time.

He said his company has a policy of not selling adult materials to juveniles and that he was surprised by the charges of engaging in a corrupt activity.

"They threw everything at me but the kitchen sink," Flynt said from Los Angeles. "Hustler today is more explicit than the issues they prosecuted me on 20 years ago. But (Deters) still doesn't want to tackle Hustler because he doesn't think he can get a conviction under the law."

Jimmy Flynt, who manages his brother's downtown bookstore, said he has no plans to change the store's operations.

"We're going to be open for a long time," he said.

The indictment charged that the brothers distributed to a juvenile materials showing explicit sexual conduct. The video titles included "Vivid Raw 3 Doubleheader," "31 Girl Pickup," "Oral Passions" and "Sex Raiders."

Deters said the 14-year-old boy bought an obscene video in Flynt's store, sold the tape to a friend and bragged about the purchase. The 14-year-old then went to police, who sent him into the store twice to buy materials, he said.

Deters said he expects the Flynt brothers to surrender within the next few weeks.

For years after Flynt's 1977 prosecution, retailers refused to sell Hustler for fear of prosecution.

But Flynt brought the magazine back to Cincinnati in May, giving free copies away downtown. Authorities did nothing.

In October, he opened his Hustler bookstore, and it has been selling videos, sex toys and Hustler along with mainstream publications.

He has said in recent months he wanted a trial on obscenity charges, because he said he believes a jury today would find that Hustler does not violate community obscenity standards. Being cleared in such a trial would make it easier for him to persuade other Cincinnati retailers to sell Hustler, he said.

For an obscenity conviction, prosecutors must prove that the average person would find that the material appeals to prurient interests and depicts sexual conduct that is offensive to community standards.

Prosecutors also must show the material lacks serious artistic, literary, scientific or political value.

Larry and Jimmy Flynt are each charged with nine counts of pandering obscenity, three counts of disseminating matter harmful to juveniles, two counts of conspiracy to engage in a pattern of corrupt activity and one count of engaging in a pattern of corrupt activity.

SEVENTH GRADERS AT RILEY COUNTY GRADE SCHOOL LOOK AT ABSTRACT PAINTINGS THEY MADE WITH MARBLES WITH THE HELP OF K-STATE ART EDUCATION STUDENTS. THE INDIVIDUAL PAINTINGS WERE LATER ASSEMBLED INTO ONE LARGE WORK.

Armed with marbles and paint, nearly 40 K-State students brought art to students in Riley County Grade School's gym.

Students in Lynda Andrus' Art for Elementary School Students class at K-State study several artists throughout the semester, including Jackson Pollock.

> "K-STATE STUDENTS HAD TO DO THIS IN CLASS. NOW THEY GET TO COME AND ACTUALLY TEACH IT TO KIDS."

> LYNDA ANDRUS
> assistant professor of art for elementary education

The class is intended for elementary education majors. It is a lab that gives them experience working with art projects suitable for grade school-aged children.

"It's just a lot of fun because you get to do a lot of the projects that you will one day teach the kids. It's neat to express your own self, and at the same time you learn how to get the kids to express their ownselves," Betsy Copeland, freshman in elementary education, said.

Copeland said they also went to a museum and learned how to get the children to comprehend art through lines. Pollock's style is called action painting.

"He throws his paintbrush and does anything he can to splatter paint," Andrus said to the grade school children.

The action painting was adapted for the children. Instead of throwing paintbrushes they rolled paint-soaked marbles across a sheet of paper to create a design. The paper was placed inside a box to prevent the marbles from rolling away.

The individual paintings were put together after all 500 students finished to create one large painting.

K-State students supervised and helped the children work on the paintings. Copeland said she had fun interacting with the children.

Andrus said showing children how to do the artwork gives practical experience to future teachers.

"K-State students had to do this in class. Now they get to come and actually teach it to kids," Andrus said.

The college students got the opportunity to work with children from several age groups, from preschool to eighth-graders.

"It was a lot of fun to get to see the different variations of ages doing the same things. It was neat to see the ability, how a kindergartner could do the same thing an eighth-grader could do," Copeland said.

Erin Thomas, junior in elementary education, said she was surprised to see how much the children cared about their artwork.

"It's cool to see the kids get excited," Thomas said. "It's kind of neat to see them care so much."

The children often don't get the chance to do art because Riley County Grade School doesn't have an art teacher.

Andrus said she was impressed with the way the whole school got involved.

'The Specials' promote new album with same old style

Review Music

Even though they're all pushing 40 or 50, the Specials still know how to put on one hell of a show.

All the way from Coventry, England, the Specials are in the midst of a U.S. tour in support of their new album, "Guilty 'Til Proved Innocent," and the tour made a stop in Lawrence on Monday night at the Granada.

The Pilfers, from New York, started the evening off to a very indifferent and mostly unreceptive crowd of about 100 people.

Featuring vocalist Coolie Ranx, formerly of the Toasters, and Vinny Nobile, formerly of Bim Skala Bim on vocals and trombone, the Pilfers played a powerful set of ska-punk.

Ranx spent most of the time on the dance floor toasting and dancing, because there were only eight people dancing at any one time during the Pilfers' set.

Ranx's toasting skills and Nobile's trombone virtuosity shone, along with the rest of the band, on such original songs as "Mr. Exploiter" and "Yakuza," as well as an older Toasters cover.

Because the crowd mostly sat down for the Pilfers' set, Ranx told the crowd, "You better dance for the Specials, or I'm gonna come out here and beat somebody up. We got a lot of maniacs in New York, and we're only five of them right here tonight."

It's too bad more people weren't into the Pilfers, because they were incredible.

By the time the Specials were ready to come on stage, the crowd had grown to about 250 people, far less than the sold-out crowd that saw the Specials at the Granada in 1996.

Then, after a too-long wait, the Specials hit the stage and tore the Granada apart. The set was kicked off with a cover of "Guns of Navarone," and the band didn't stop much as it hurtled through several older songs until it finally stopped to catch its collective breath.

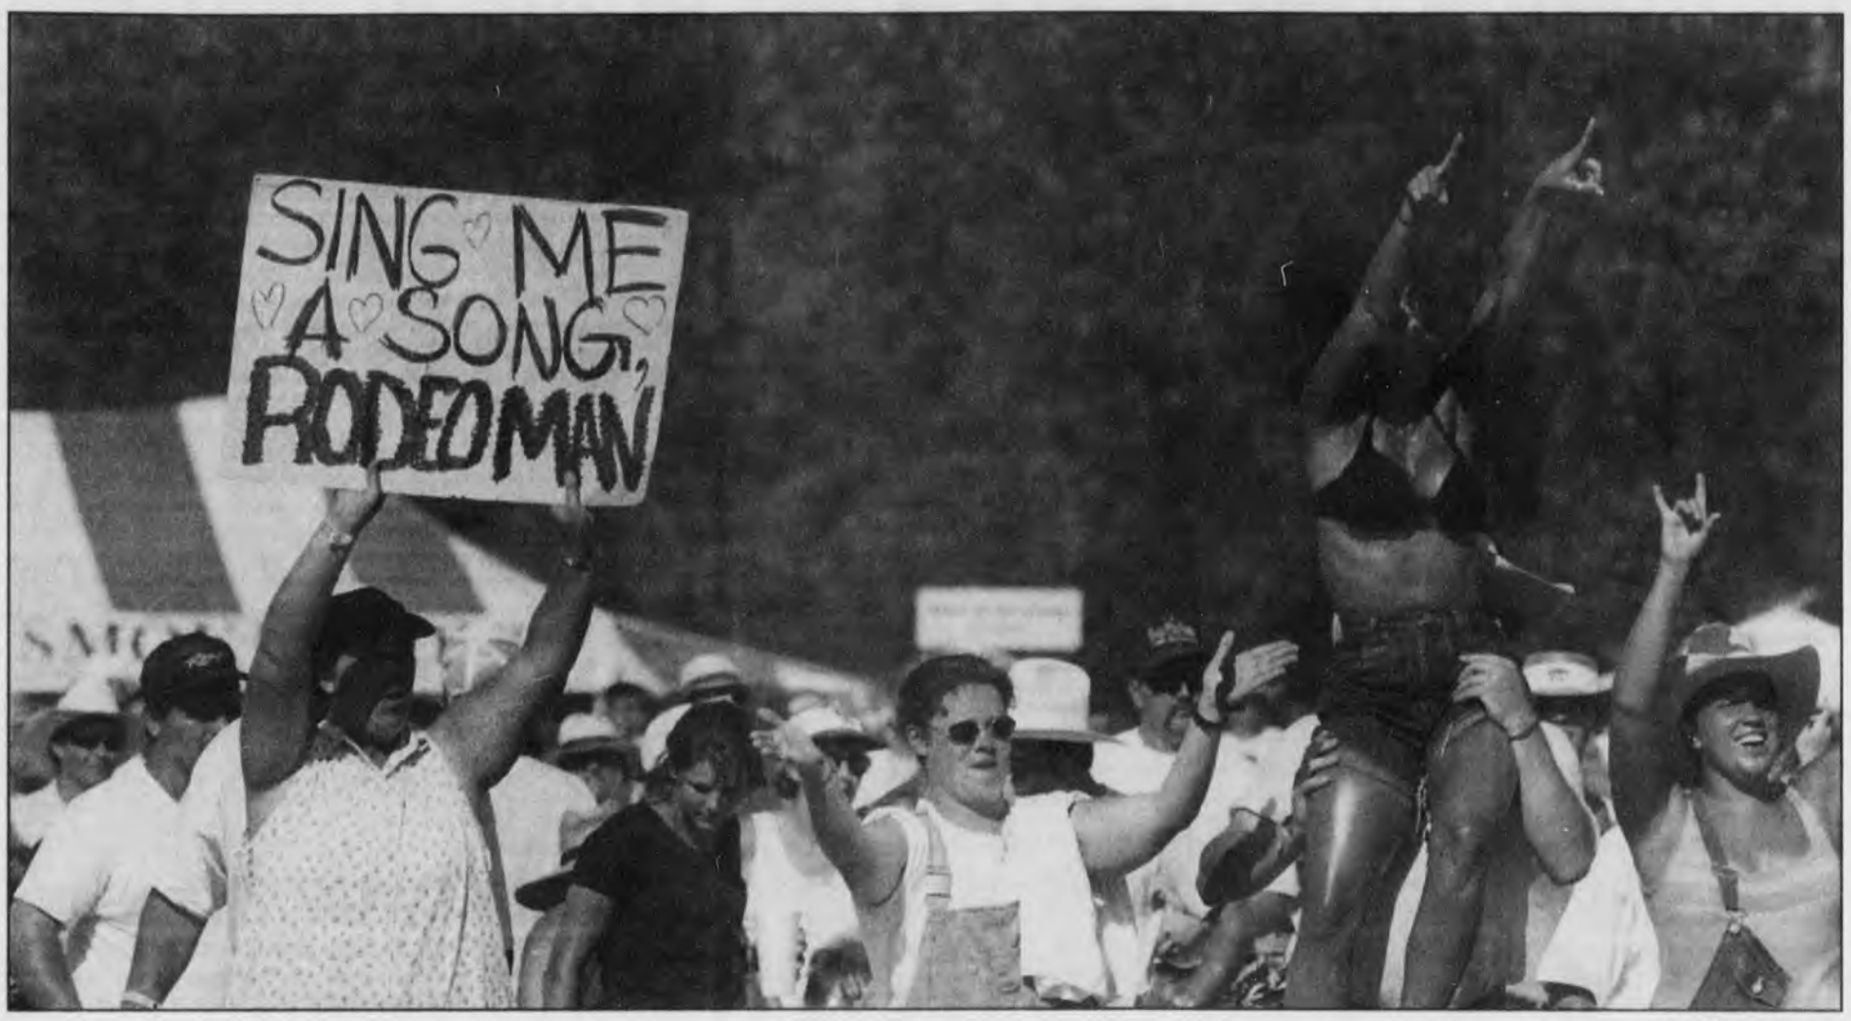
While I watched the band, I felt like I had been transported back to London 20 years ago when the Specials were starting out. Vocalist Neville Staple, bassist Horace Panter and rhythm guitarist and vocalist Lynval Golding bounded across the stage like men half their age. Guitarist Roddy Byers ripped through guitar licks like a hot knife through butter, while looking incredibly cool at the same time. It was inspiring, to say the least.

Even though the Specials are promoting a brand new album, most of the songs played were older material, such as "Do The Dog," "Do Nothing" and "Stupid Marriage." A few songs from the new album were thrown in, however, such as "Fearful" and the first single, "It's You."

I was really surprised that no songs from 1996's "Today's Specials" album were played, though.

After exactly an hour on stage, the set was over, but the crowd chanted and screamed for more, so the 2-Tone heroes came back on stage and played "Nite Club" and a masterful version of "Ghost Town."

Then, they were gone again. The Specials proved once again they've still got it after all these years, and also without original members Jerry Dammers and Terry Hall.



I bet no one in attendance Monday night missed Dammers or Hall one bit. I know I didn't.

Organizers hope to improve, expand Stampede facilities

Country Stampede organizers gave proposals to Tuttle Creek on possible changes or improvements they want the park to make, which is the process it is going through to try to improve electricity.

"The park has to approve it," Lovin said. "We ask, 'Does it comply with the direction the park wants to go?'"

Employees of Tuttle Creek might be putting in a lot of hours during Country Stampede, but Lovin said he had to look at the big picture before making the schedule.

"The following weekend is the Fourth of July, and I can't tap myself," he said.

Lovin said the park will have maintenance crews working 24 hours a day and will bring in rangers from other state parks, in addition to Country Stampede security.

into it, she said.

Cunningham said another problem comes with estimating attendance figures for Country Stampede. She said past reports have put ticket sales at 20,000 per day, which is incorrect, she said. That figure is actually the approximate number of people attending, which is completely different, considering one person could buy a three-day ticket.

"Comments get misconstrued," she said. "There's a big difference."

Tickets for this year's event are available by phone, by mail or at Streetside Records in Aggieville.

Streetside employee Gemini Pankey said although he doesn't have an exact number for ticket sales so far, response has been good. He said more people are getting information at this point than actually buying tickets.

"They usually wait till closer to the date," he said. "A couple weeks before the concert, it gets crazy."

said. "Michael relates to those youngsters and then to have someone say, 'I don't like you anymore because of this thing.' That's what hurt him."

Bishop said he sees himself as a role model, and although some of his actions might not be the best for people looking up to him, he tries to have a positive effect on children.

"At that point in time, I can understand how she felt," Bishop said. "But I have been getting a lot of positive input back from a lot of people expressing what they thought, and everything has turned out real positive."

Snyder said he hopes the arrest will not affect Bishop's football future, and knows his play-caller's name will be thrown around as a possible Heisman Trophy candidate.

"I'd like to think anybody who'd have any impact on Michael's life and his career that if at some point in time, they don't have an understanding of it now, they will have an understanding of what took place," Snyder said. "It's time to get on with Michael's football career."

Social Security tops Clinton's Kansas City agenda

the system through individual retirement accounts, raising the retirement age and reducing cost-of-living adjustments for beneficiaries, among other ideas.

A combination of those solutions might be the answer, said 63-year-old June Padgett, a Kansas City Republican.

"I think a little bit from each one of those might do it," she said, moments after snapping a picture of Clinton as he shook hands with audience members after the forum.

A youthful presence at the forum might have stemmed from recent fears of area teachers and professors that student knowledge of Social Security is dangerously low despite the number of people affected by the system.

More than 133 million Americans pay for Social Security through payroll taxes, with about 43 million people drawing either retirement or disability benefits. The average American retiree receives a monthly benefit of about $745, with disability payments averaging about $705 a month.

Clinton, who called for a national dialogue on Social Security during his State of the Union address, made opening remarks at the forum and returned later for a question-and-answer session with the audience.

He offered no specific solutions but talked forcefully about the need for some type of reform to ensure Social Security's survival for current recipients, baby boomers and their children.

"WE SHOULD NOT ABANDON A BASIC PROGRAM THAT HAS BEEN ONE OF THE GREAT SUCCESSES IN OUR NATION'S HISTORY."
PRESIDENT BILL CLINTON on Social Security in a speech in Kansas City, Mo.

Sponsored by the Concord Coalition and the American Association of Retired Persons, the Kansas City forum featured speakers of both political parties and people from a wide array of economic situations. After Clinton, a congressional delegation addressed the audience, including U.S. Sens. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., and Bob Kerrey, D-Neb.

Clinton said it would take only relatively small changes to make sure Social Security remains solvent, not a massive overhaul.

"We should not abandon a basic program that has been one of the great successes in our nation's history," he said.

Clinton said he would assess reform proposals that guarantee the system not only for retirees but also for the disabled, children and the spouses who also rely on Social Security benefits.

And he said any change must preserve the "fiscal discipline" that he said led to a balanced budget and the prospect of budget surpluses in the years ahead.

"To the older Americans, let me say you have nothing to worry about," he told the audience of more than 700 at Penn Valley Community College. "Social Security is as strong as ever."

Addressing younger workers and teens in the audience, Clinton quoted a popular survey now making the rounds of the Social Security debate.

"I saw a poll, which was reported to be serious, which said Americans in their 20s thought it was more likely they would see a UFO" before a Social Security check, he said.

The comment drew laughs from the audience.

Before Clinton's arrival, special interest groups arrived at the campus, looking for news cameras and reporters to get across their hopes for the debate. Among the throng were representatives from the Kansas City Labor Party, the Cato Institute and the National Association of Manufacturers.

Before Clinton spoke, Margie Eucalyptus busily passed out fliers for a group calling itself the Alliance for Democracy.

One of the group's goals, she said, was keeping Social Security intact while fighting attempts to privatize the system.

"We don't want to leave the system in the hands of stockbrokers and bankers," she said.

"I trust them less than I trust the government."

Legendary country singer dies at 55 from blood clot

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Tammy Wynette, 55, best known for the country standard "Stand By Your Man,"died at her home Monday evening. The cause of death was believed to be a blood clot, spokeswoman Evelyn Shriver said. The funeral will be 4:30 p.m. Thursday at the Ryman Auditorium.

A quarter-century after Wynette first told women to "Stand By Your Man," the song again had caused controversy. And again she defended it. Fiercely.

In 1992, Hillary Rodham Clinton answered an interviewer's question about her husband's alleged infidelities by saying: "I'm not sitting here like some little woman standing by my man like Tammy Wynette."

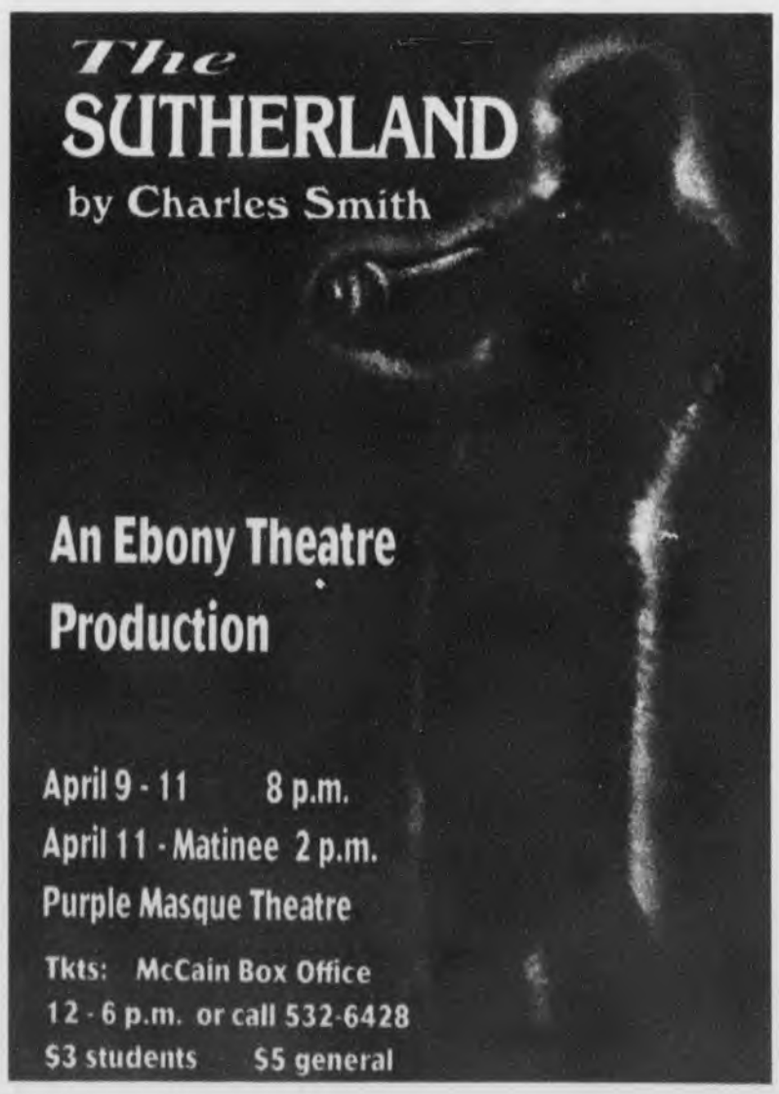
A furious Wynette demanded an apology, saying Hillary Clinton had offended "every true country music fan and every person who has 'made it on their own' with no one to take them to a White House."

Clinton apologized.

The episode was typical Wynette. The hairdresser-turned-country-singer often took flak for millions of women who, unlike Clinton, weren't at the vanguard of feminism.

Wynette spoke to and about lower- and middle-class women who struggled to live happily ever after in rural towns and suburbs but found that real life didn't always work out like the fairy tales.

Through five marriages, numerous health problems, more than 30 million records sold and worldwide fame, Wynette never lost touch with them.



She couldn't.

It was who she was.

"Her story is really the story of country music," said Kyle Young of the Country Music Foundation, the historical arm of the country music industry. "From humble beginnings as a hairdresser to superstardom. The strength of her music was she connected with a wide audience, because she really tapped into real situations in people's lives."

Observatory finding raises prospect of life in space

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LONDON — Orbiting high above Earth, Europe's infrared space observatory has discovered water around stars and planets and in many other surprising places, raising expectations of life elsewhere in the universe, the European Space Agency said Tuesday.

The discovery of water vapor in the atmosphere of Saturn's largest moon, Titan, has generated the most excitement, because that moon might duplicate the conditions that led to the creation of life on Earth, said Roger Bonnet, the agency's director of science.

"Now that water has been discovered ... this lends more support to the possibility that we have all the conditions which prevailed on Earth 4 1/2 billion years ago to give birth to life," he said. "These conditions may also exist on Titan, and the only thing you need is a little heat to heat up Titan, and maybe (the) birth of life may be seen."

They have been able to see water throughout the universe, to see where stars are forming, to shed light on distant galaxies — and to solve riddles that have puzzled astronomers for centuries, said Reinhard Genzel, chairman of the agency's Astronomy Working Group.

"With ISO, for the first time, you could see water," Genzel said at a news conference Tuesday. "In fact, it has been a spectacular vista to see water everywhere."

The observatory found water around dying stars, newborn stars, in intersteller space, in other galaxies, and in the atmospheres around Mars and all the outer planets, in particular the Titan moon, Genzel said.

"Now you may say, 'So what?' Well, that's actually quite surprising because it's so cold out there. So water should normally freeze out. So the fact that there is water in these atmospheres is really rather remarkable," he said.

Genzel said the explanation probably has to do with the fact that something in space is bringing water to the icy outer planets all the time.

"And that is important, because maybe that's the way water came on Earth in the early part of the solar system — when there were many more comets around, and the Earth was bombarded by these icy objects bringing in water," he said.

Athena Coustenis of the Paris Observatory said scientists knew Titan's atmosphere contained carbon monoxide and carbon dioxide, so they expected water vapor, too. Now that it's been detected, she said, scientists hope to study the mysterious moon's organic chemistry.

When the plutonium-powered spacecraft arrives at Saturn in 2004 after a 2.2 billion-mile journey, it will release the Huygens probe, built by the European Space Agency, which will land on Titan.

"After ISO, the Huygens probe will reveal the actual degree of complexity in a mixture of elaborate organic molecules closely resembling the chemical soup of the young Earth," Coustenis said.

Last month, U.S. scientists reported that closer-than-ever pictures of Jupiter's moon Europa showed a 16-mile-wide crater that might have been filled with water, and large frozen plates surrounded by what appeared to be slushy material.

The photos, taken in December by the spacecraft Galileo, bolstered the theory that an ocean possibly containing life exists beneath Europa's icy crust.

With the European infrared telescope, Genzel said scientists also unexpectedly discovered remarkably high concentrations of water around young stars in the Orion constellation.

"These young stars send out shock waves — vast streams of gas which run into the surrounding material out of which they were born. And then these streams of gas, these shocks, smash their molecules around and water is formed," Genzel said.

"That may be a way to then convert material into water, which then again may play an important role in the life cycle of forming planets, and maybe life," he said.

The infrared observatory also has been able to solve the riddle of what causes distant galaxies to be up to 10,000 times more luminous than the Milky Way, Genzel said.

Xerox to lay off 9,000 workers to cut costs, expects to save $1 billion in 3 years

ASSOCIATED PRESS

STAMFORD, Conn. — Xerox Corp. said Tuesday it will eliminate 9,000 jobs — almost 10 percent of its work force — to slash costs and challenge Hewlett-Packard's dominance in the rapidly growing market for lower-priced digital copiers and printers.

The company said it will take a charge of about $1 billion in the second quarter for the restructuring, which will include closing some factories around the world. It expects to save $1 billion annually within three to four years.

The job cuts amount to less than 10 percent of the company's worldwide work force of 91,400.

By paring its expenses, Xerox hopes to strengthen its position against other competitors in the home and small-office market — such as Hewlett Packard, Canon Inc. and Richo Co.

"Those companies have much lower costs than ours, and we think to compete effectively, we need to get our costs down into the range of those competitors," Judd Everhart, Xerox spokesman, said.

Xerox has struggled to reduce costs as it shifts from old-style copiers that operate with lenses and light bulbs to multipurpose digital models that can be upgraded to print, scan and fax documents when connected to personal computers.

Last year, Xerox unveiled a family of digital copiers that tie into computer networks. The company said it plans to aggressively market the new products in office super stores in a direct challenge to Hewlett-Packard's dominance.

Xerox said the job cuts will be made through a combination of attrition, early retirement and layoffs. About 45 percent of the jobs will be cut from the United States, another 45 percent from Europe, and the remaining 10 percent from Latin America and Canada.

In Rochester, N.Y., where Xerox has its main U.S. manufacturing and sales operations, 1,400 jobs will be eliminated in the next two years. Xerox would not specify where the job cuts outside Rochester will be made. But a spokesman said every operation is being reviewed.

Nevertheless, analysts praised the move, which comes after the company posted a 20 percent increase in profits last year.

Wiring problems found with 747s

▶ AIRLINES MAY SEE MORE INSPECTION REQUIREMENTS.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Investigators trying to determine what caused TWA Flight 800 to explode found problems with the wiring and fuel-monitoring systems on that plane and four other Boeing 747s, prompting the federal safety agency to make sweeping recommendations Tuesday that could affect thousands of airliners.

After finding frayed wires, the National Transportation Safety Board asked the Federal Aviation Administration to require wiring and fuel probe inspections on three early series of the jumbo jet, the 747-100, -200 and -300. TWA 800 and the other planes, all older models, had probes with sharp edges that could have frayed some of the planes' wiring.

The NTSB also wants the FAA to require separation or rerouting of fuel-monitoring wires away from bundles of other wires that carry electrical charges. The agency fears that those wires, which carry up to 350 volts, could have sent a jolt to one of the fuel wires.

In addition, the agency is asking the FAA to require the installation of surge protection systems to prevent electrical jolts from reaching fuel tanks.

Only the FAA has the power to mandate the changes, but it immediately issued a statement saying it was already working with Boeing on requiring many of the recommendations. Boeing did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

Taken together, the recommendations mean that all 750 older Boeing 747s still in service would have to undergo inspections and possibly extensive rewiring. The rest of the recommendations could affect 500 to 600 newer 747s — as well as other types of planes — because the NTSB wants them applied to all applicable transport airplane fuel tanks.

"The safety board recognizes the difficulty and expense associated with physically separating wires from other wires and adding shielding to wires on in-service air carrier airplanes," NTSB Chairman Jim Hall wrote in his 10-page letter to the FAA.

"However, the separation of the ... (fuel-monitoring wires) from other power sources by shielding and separation can protect fuel tank wires from power sources that can potentially ignite an explosive vapor in a fuel tank."

The agency stressed that it has not concluded what caused the crash of TWA Flight 800, which killed 230 people. The Paris-bound Boeing 747 blew up off Long Island, N.Y., in July 1996 shortly after taking off from Kennedy International Airport.

The chief suspect in that disaster is a combination of events involving damaged wires and corrosion on a fuel-measuring rod, which might have introduced a spark or flame into the center fuel tank. The tank was virtually empty and the vapors in it heated up as the plane sat on the runway on a hot day waiting to take off.

At NTSB hearings last year, experts from Boeing testified that the company has been testing different ways to protect the center fuel tank from exploding — including using different types of fuels.

In a statement, the FAA said it agreed with the intent of the NTSB recommendations.

"The FAA is working actively with the NTSB and Boeing to develop both short- and long-term solutions for addressing fuel-tank ignition sources and reducing or eliminating explosive fuel/air mixtures," the statement said.

The NTSB said its investigation of TWA Flight 800, while not yet determining the cause of the crash, had turned up other safety concerns that could not be ignored.

An examination of the wiring and fuel probes on TWA 800, three retired planes and a plane that is still in service found frayed wires or sharp edges on some early-model Honeywell fuel probes could provide an ignition source.

It also said it found two inappropriate repairs in the fuel-monitoring wires for TWA 800's wing-tip fuel tanks, although investigators said they do not believe they contributed to the crash. TWA issued a statement saying the repairs had been performed in accordance with Boeing and FAA procedures.

In addition, the NTSB recommended the FAA conduct studies into copper sulfide deposits found in airplane fuel tanks to determine the levels of deposits that might be hazardous.

While conceding that Boeing and the FAA were working on service bulletins suggesting some of the recommendations, the NTSB wrote, "Compliance with SBs is not mandatory."

Dow falls back to less than 9,000 as traders sell shares, take profits

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHICAGO — After soaring to more than 9,000 for the first time ever, the Dow's record-stetting trend did not continue Tuesday.

At late afternoon, the Dow was down as much as 139.75 points, slipping to less than 8,900 as traders sold shares to take profits on the latest gains and as technology issues continued a retreat. It recovered somewhat in heavy trading to close with a loss of 76.73 at 8,956.50.

The Dow, a complicated index based on the prices of 30 blue-chip companies, is the oldest and most widely followed Wall Street indicator. It began the year at 7,908, but by gaining 49.82 points Monday, it stormed to 9,033.23, its first-ever close higher than 9,000.

The final nudge to Monday's record was the announced merger of Citicorp and Travelers Group, two financial services companies with surging stock values. At $82 billion, it easily would be the biggest business deal ever.

"People just feel the general trend for the market will always be up," said Matt Waddell, director of online brokerage CompuTEL Securities in San Francisco. "If the market goes down 150 points, people come in looking for bargains, if it goes down 500 points, the same."

The market has been running without a sustained dip since 1990, when the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and worries about the economy sent stocks lower. One thousand dollars invested in the Dow Jones stocks on Oct. 11, 1990 — when the Dow was at 2,365.10 — would be worth $4,631 today if dividends were reinvested.

But what about the Asian economic crisis? Just three months ago, it turned the stomachs of some market watchers and prompted dire warnings. And the Dow opened the year with a 4-percent slide.

But the American economy has kept humming along. And with inflation apparently at bay, optimistic small investors continued to flood the market with money from their mutual funds, 401(k) plans, and Individual Retirement Accounts.

The Investment Company Institute, a mutual fund trade group in Washington, D.C., estimated that nearly $50 billion flowed into mutual funds alone from December through February. Many of these investors are looking to the long term, too — as of 1996, the trade group said more than one-third of fund assets were earmarked for retirement.

Investment banker Sofia Anastopoulos of Chicago sold her stock portfolio in early October, before the market briefly tumbled to less than 7,000, to make a down payment on a condominium. She now is looking to jump back in.

"People keep saying, 'This is incredible. The market's too high,' but it just keeps getting higher and higher," Anastopoulos said. "I'm looking at buying opportunities, like everybody else today, and plan on letting that money stay there for the ride."

Still, a good portion of the market is waiting for the other shoe to drop, said investment counselor Marc Pershan of Krantz, Pershan Investor Advocate Service in Northbrook, Ill.

"We have half the people saying they're too late to get into the market and half the people saying they should have gotten out before," he said. "There's a nervousness that things have run up too high, but we're trying to focus people on longer-term trends as opposed to where the market is today."

While the Dow's 14.2-percent gain this year easily outshines what investors can get at the bank, the uncertain ways of the stock market keep many from diving in.

"You have to have that kind of gambling mentality to go there because just like it goes up, it can go right back down," said Banks, the Philadelphia operations coordinator. "When you start to do stocks, you need to be at a point where you don't have to worry too much about what happens with that money."

IRS strengthens procedures for releasing confidential taxpayer records to callers

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — With a phone call to the Internal Revenue Service, a government investigator was able to get confidential taxpayer records of prominent people including a mayor and a sports announcer by providing little more than their names, addresses and Social Security numbers.

"Under current procedures, an impostor who knows a taxpayer's name, address and Social Security number can find out tax and income information from the Internal Revenue Service with a simple phone call," according to a 1997 internal IRS audit of agency practices.

A copy of the audit, dated Sept. 30, 1997, was obtained by The Associated Press. In response to the findings, the IRS said it quickly strengthened its procedures last fall by requiring taxpayers to provide more detailed information from their tax returns in order to receive sensitive records.

"I am extremely confident that what we require exceeds what very well might be required in private industry," said Ron Watson, the IRS executive officer for customer service. "We have put far more stringent requirements in place now."

"Is it an absolutely foolproof system?" Watson said. "I don't think any system is foolproof."

Watson said he welcomed the report's scrutiny because it enabled the agency to improve its systems.

The IRS is required to guard against unauthorized disclosure of taxpayer records while allowing taxpayers access to their own files.

"We take these kinds of reports very, very seriously," Watson said.

IRS internal auditors conducted 109 test calls from 17 offices in the Northeast and West between July 1996 and February 1997. They posed as local taxpayers, including — with their permission — some prominent business people, a mayor and a sports announcer. They were not identified in the report.

"Auditors were able to secure tax and income information over the phone using names, addresses and (Social Security numbers) obtained from sources available to the public," the report said. In three of the cases, the investigators also provided the filing status of the people to gain their records.

Jury selection for Koch trial ends, attorneys scheduled to make opening statements today

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — They include a kindergarten teacher, a physical therapist, a mailroom supervisor and a retired Goodyear worker, and they will hear a federal lawsuit involving the multimillionaire Koch brothers.

Two days of jury selection ended Tuesday, and six men and six women were impaneled in U.S. District Court. Attorneys are scheduled to make their opening statements today.

The trial pits Frederick Koch, at 64 the oldest of four brothers, and Bill Koch, 57, the youngest brother by minutes, against Charles Koch, 62, the chairman of the company founded by their father, and David Koch, 57, Bill Koch's older twin.

Bill Koch, Frederick Koch and other former stockholders contend Koch Industries and its officers cheated them in a 1983 stock sale. The defendants deny the charge and claim the lawsuit is the result of a vendetta.

As a group, the jurors appear to have little experience with accounting, and both sides plan to present testimony about bookkeeping issues. No juror travels in any of the Koch brothers' social circles, although at least two have had small dealings with Koch Industries.

The trial could last seven weeks.

More than $1 billion is at stake. Koch Industries is the nation's second-largest privately owned corporation, behind agribusiness giant Cargill.

During jury selection, Fred Bartlit, of Chicago, the lead attorney for Bill Koch and the other plaintiffs, asked potential jurors about their management styles if they had supervisory positions. He also asked whether they had problems with one family member suing another.

One juror, the kindergarten teacher, acknowledged she had problems with lawsuits involving family members. However, she said a lawsuit would be acceptable if problems could not be worked out.

The defendants' lead attorney, Robert Howard, of Wichita, asked potential jurors about their feelings toward oil companies, such as Koch Industries. He also asked them how they felt about large corporations and the wealthy in general.

"If you are uncomfortable at this point in time, we'd rather you let us know," he told potential jurors.

The pool of potential jurors had about 60 members, but U.S. District Judge Sam Crow and the attorneys interviewed only 28 of them.

Crow dismissed six of them, including a woman who said Koch Industries was an important client of the business at which she is a purchasing agent.

Both sides then used their challenges to remove five potential jurors each. They did not have to explain their reasons.

Skoog returns to K-State as award-winning poet

CLAUDETTE RILEY
Kansas State Collegian

The only poet ever elected K-State student body president, Ed Skoog gave an emotional and reminiscent reading of his published work Wednesday afternoon.

Steve Heller, professor of English, said he heard Skoog was speaking at an event sponsored by the Salina Arts Council earlier in the week and convinced him to speak at K-State.

"One of the things we like to do is invite successful former students in to share their work with current students," Heller said. "There are many of his former professors interested in hearing his work as well as friends and former voters."

Skoog served as student body president in 1993-94 after success with his Wild Turkee Workers Party.

"For several years, I've maintained that Ed Skoog could be the governor of Kansas," Heller said. "It's literature's gain and our loss that he doesn't want to be."

A collection of Skoog's poetry called "Tool Kit" was published in 1996 and won the Merriam-Frontier Award from the University of Montana where Skoog earned a master of fine arts degree in creative writing.

Skoog left his job as a content writer for Microsoft Corp. in Seattle one month ago. He moved to New Orleans and is now working on the third draft of a novel set in contemporary Abilene, Kan., titled "Eisenhower Jacket."

Elizabeth Dodd, associate professor of English, said Skoog enrolled in a creative writing class she team-taught with Heller.

"I remember Ed writing an absolutely superb villanelle about playing the banjo. It was graceful, and his use of repetition and rhythm, almost jazz, was wonderful," Dodd said. "It was just clear he was a poet from the beginning."

Dodd said she remembered Skoog taking an interest in a Richard Hugo poem, one of the most difficult in the collection for the course.

"He was, of course, incredibly smart and had a great sense of humor," she said.

Skoog's poem "Tale of Who We Are" was inspired by a contest in Seattle where bar patrons spent $25 each for a chance to smash a work by Seattle artist Dale Chihuly. Chihuly's orange sculpture titled "Chandelier 1996" hangs in the entrance of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

"He makes terrible art and gets a lot of money for it, which is probably more difficult than making good art," Skoog said.

Before reading his poem "Milton," Skoog said walking through Eisenhower Hall that afternoon reminded him of his first days at K-State and a course taught by Michael Donnelly, associate professor of English, about the poet.

"The smell in Eisenhower was the smell of reading poems for the first time. The smell of going to my first class in Eisenhower," Skoog said. "That's where I learned for the first time that poets weren't all dead."

Skoog's poetry was heavily punctuated by memories of his travels and life in Kansas. He told stories about hunting for morel mushrooms, his Swedish ancestry and a moment he spied while driving titled "Deaf Lovers Arguing in Public."

Jonathan Holden, distinguished professor of English and poet-in-residence, said Skoog was a brilliant student.

"Ed was one of the most talented students I've ever had. One of the most capacious people I've ever met. I thought of him at the time, and still do, as a poet like Pablo Neruda," Holden said.

"He gave a wonderful reading with the same self-assurance he's always had but without the vanity."

K-State plan for fall break to be debated

ALECIA TERRELL
Kansas State Collegian

A proposal that would give K-State students a fall break will be debated by Faculty Senate next month.

In the past, students and faculty have had to wait until Thanksgiving break before receiving vacation time. The new plan, proposed by Academic Affairs Committee chair Rhett Trujillo and Student Body Vice President Andy Macklin, would add a three-day weekend in mid-October.

What do we think?
The Collegian editorial board says a fall break is much needed at K-State. See Page 4

TRUJILLO

MACKLIN

Macklin said the plan was created because students don't have any breaks between Labor Day and Thanksgiving break, which is about an 11-week period.

Trujillo said the original fall break plan was to start school two days early in the fall, which would allow for a four-day break in mid-October.

That idea was coupled with a reading day proposal, which would have given students and faculty a break on the Friday before finals week, allowing for a three-day weekend.

Macklin said

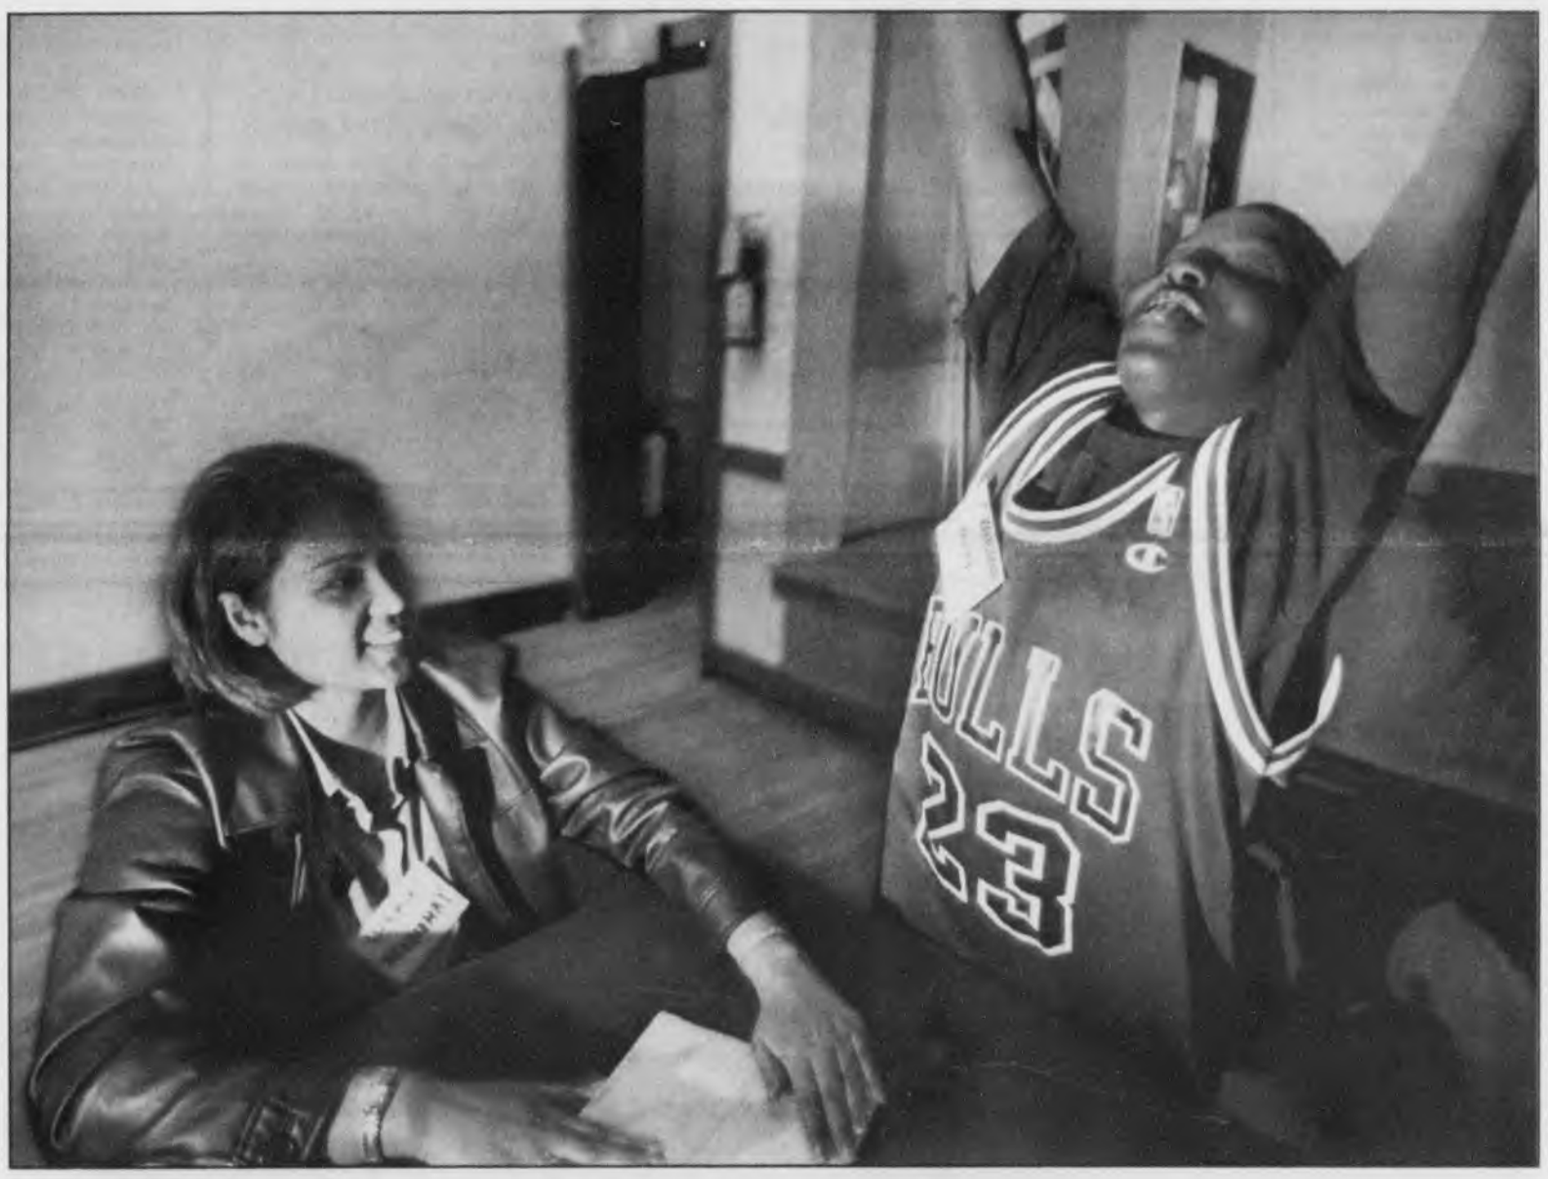
Tobacco companies to fight legislation from U.S. Congress

ASSOCIATED PRESS



WASHINGTON, D.C. — Changing course, four of the nation's largest cigarette manufacturers said Wednesday they would fight anti-tobacco legislation in Congress. They said they support last year's less-expensive agreement with states to curb teen smoking but concluded that effort is now "dead."

President Clinton and congressional leaders said they would press forward to pass a law to discourage youngsters from smoking by raising the costs.

"I'm very disappointed," Clinton said upon his return from a trip to Chicago. "I've been fighting for more than two years to protect our kids from the dangers of tobacco. And we're going to get this done. Now, they can be part of it or they can fight it. But, I think they ought to be part of it."

Students devote time to after-school tutoring program

JOE HURLA
Kansas State Collegian

Three days a week a group of volunteers, consisting largely of K-State students, gather to tutor elementary and secondary school students.

The Hand to Hand program meets every Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evening to help students who are lagging behind their classmates.

Marianne Cullers is the director of the Hand to Hand program.

"Our target group is low-income students from around the neighborhood. But because the schools have been so good at advertising the program, we've attracted more than we had planned on," Cullers said.

To meet the needs of the increasing number of students seeking help, the program has had to expand rapidly from the one tutor it boasted at its inception in early 1996.

"We have a different number of volunteers each week, and we never really know what to expect. Each night we have anywhere from five to 20 volunteers show up," Cullers said.

This group of volunteers consists of K-State students, retired teachers and other volunteers from around the community.

"We have a good mix of volunteers. The retired teachers are very helpful because of their experience, and the K-State students provide a lot of the enthusiasm and one-to-one attention that our program needs," Cullers said.

Amy Riedesel, sophomore in elementary education, said she is enthusiastic about the program.

"I really enjoy it. I like working with kids, and that is something I don't always get a lot of opportunity to do," Riedesel said. "But here, I get to work with kids in a way that is both fun and rewarding for them."

The reward for each student involved varies.

"They helped me with my homework and taught me some stuff that I didn't know. They also showed me an easier way to do my math than my teacher showed me," explained Chelsie Leonard, a fifth-grader from Riley County Grade School, who was attending her first Hand to Hand session.

"And after we get done with our homework we get stickers and prizes," said Brittany Lockhart, a fifth-grader from Bluemont School and a veteran of the Hand to Hand program.

The students being tutored aren't the only ones who benefit from the program.

"It seems like I get a lot more out of it than I put in, just like lots of volunteer programs," said Teri Gatschet, senior in elementary education. "While I'm helping them with their homework, I'm also learning. I learn a lot

Governor signs bill requiring all homes, apartments to install smoke detectors

TOPEKA — Gov. Bill Graves signed into law a bill that requires smoke detectors in all homes and apartments.

Surrounded by fire chiefs and other fire officials, Graves signed the bill on Wednesday. It also contains a component that encourages rural housing development by allowing tax-increment financing.

Graves said the bill "represents two success stories."

The bill requires the installation of smoke detectors in every single-family residence, on every floor of the building.

Opponents of the smoke detector bill said it represented a government intrusion into people's lives.

But bill sponsor Sen. Janice Hardenburger, R-Haddam, said the new law is mainly an education tool.

"There are not going to be smoke detector police knocking on doors," she said.

Prosecutor will seek jail time for people charged in $70,000 worth of vandalism

OLATHE, Kan. — A prosecutor who filed charges against 14 people about an out-of-control beer party that resulted in $70,000 in damage to a luxury home said he'll seek jail time for some of them.

"I think it's more than appropriate for the ringleaders to be doing some time in jail," Johnson County District Attorney Paul Morrison said Tuesday. "What these young people did is serious."

And, he said, all who caused damage can expect to pay restitution.

"Before the smoke clears on this, somebody is going to be getting their checkbook out," Morrison said.

Morrison filed the felony charges against 10 adults and four juveniles and said more can be expected as additional police reports come in. The 14 range in age from 16 to 22. All of them are charged with burglary and criminal damage to property, and two were charged with furnishing intoxicants to minors.

A judge set bonds of $3,000 for those charged as adults. Bonds for the juveniles will be set when they appear before a judge.

The $300,000 home in the upscale Kansas City suburb of Leawood had been vacant for several weeks after renters moved out. Authorities said organizers of the March 7 beer party broke into the house, covered the windows to prevent light from being seen and charged $5 admission.

Some of those at the party, which was raided after police got a tip from someone who went to it, had knocked huge holes in interior walls throughout the house. Light fixtures and windows were broken, and walls and floors were defaced with spray paint.

Police in German village to test saliva from men in hopes of finding murderer

CLOPPENBURG, Germany — Police seeking the rapist-murderer of an 11-year-old girl will collect saliva from 18,000 men in a German town this week and test the samples for DNA.

The voluntary genetic tests are an unprecedented evidence-gathering technique in Germany.

The tests will be conducted on men ages 18-30 in the area around Struecklingen, the girl's hometown of 3,500 people near the Dutch border and North Sea.

The strangled and stabbed body of Christina Nytsch was discovered March 21 in woods eight miles from the town. She had disappeared five days earlier on her way home from an indoor swimming pool.

About 250 police will conduct the tests today and Friday in Cloppenburg. They expect results within a few weeks.

Mass DNA testing helped Welsh police catch a killer in 1996. It also was used successfully in a 1986 rape and murder case in central England, which later became the subject of a Joseph Wambaugh book, "The Blooding."

But two rounds of DNA tests in a western French town have failed to produce suspects in the murder of a 13-year-old British girl.

Gerry Baby Products recalls monitors; Honeywell recalls heaters as fire hazards

WASHINGTON D.C. — Gerry Baby Products is recalling about 86,000 Clear Choice baby monitors because the product's rechargeable battery can cause a fire, the Consumer Product Safety Commission said Wednesday.

The Denver-based Gerry received one report of flames coming from a monitor's parent unit and four reports of smoke, the commission said in a statement.

In another recall, Honeywell Consumer Products, of Southborough, Mass., is asking for the return of 1.6 million Duracraft brand heaters, 8,000 DeLonghi brand heaters and 150,000 Duracraft and Honeywell humidifiers, the commission said.

The heaters and humidifiers can overheat and pose a fire hazard, the commission said.

Glickman finishes agriculture forums, urges Senate to renew research funding

AMES, Iowa — The trend toward big hog operations has damaged soil conservation efforts and has thrown people who have "good sense" off the land, Secretary Dan Glickman was told Wednesday.

In the final of seven agriculture forums across the country, Glickman also gently prodded the U.S. Senate to get moving on a bill to renew funding for research projects, crop insurance and food stamps for some legal immigrants.

Glickman conducted the forums to get responses on the new farm bill that weans farmers from government farm payments, allowing them more freedom to plant whatever they want. There wasn't much discussion of that from several hundred farmers who gathered at Iowa State University, many of whom were more interested in the intricacies of crop insurance, loan rates or organic farming standards.

The only emotion came from two speakers who were critical of large hog operations.

One was Hardin County farmer John Gilbert, who said the large livestock farmers were turning their backs to conservation efforts.

"We're having a hard time maintaining conservation. We have no leverage, no traction with these large producers who are increasingly farming the land to maintain a place to spread manure.

"We're dealing with bureaucracy on the top, and we're short greatly on the passion it takes to make conservation work," he said. "We think we need a lot more authority, a lot more support at the local level. We're very committed."

Glickman said the same concern is one of the hottest agriculture issues across the country. He didn't offer any solutions but reminded the audience that one of his first acts as secretary was to file a lawsuit against IBP, the country's largest meatpacker, alleging preferential pricing practices favoring large hog lots. A portion of the suit was thrown out, and the rest is pending.

Later, a leader in the anti-big hog movement, Larry Ginter of Marshall County, drew loud applause when he accused Jill Long Thompson, an assistant agriculture secretary, of approving a $400,000 no-interest loan to a large hog operator, Heartland Pork, earlier this year.

Heartland is using the money to build a new feed mill in Iowa Falls, Iowa, which in turn will "bring more hog factories to Iowa and help Heartland compete with independent hog farmers across the state," Ginter said.

Thompson later explained that paperwork for the loan was handled by the agriculture department but the money came from a rural electric cooperative.

Rhythms signaling war were heard Wednesday in the K-State Student Union along with rhythms of worship and entertainment.

Five members of the African Student Union played drums as part of International Week, which continues through Saturday.

The African Student Union will perform again Saturday during the International Night Cultural Show.

Osborn Ogonyo, sophomore in social science and a native of Kenya, said drumming is an important part of African culture.

"When we drum sometimes it's for war, calling people for war," he said. "We drum to celebrate after war. We drum for entertainment, too. So drumming has been part of the culture to call people. You can just beat drums, and they will come for like a meeting."

He said people would know what the drums mean because of the beat.

"If you play a drum for war, it's got its own beat," he said. "People will know it by the beat. If you are playing it for celebration, the drumming beats are different. It varies from fast to slow to all that kind of stuff, but the society knows precisely what the drums are meant for."

Ogonyo said they played a variety of rhythms, including one for worship, a couple for entertainment and even one for war.

Peter Lwigale, graduate student in biology and a native of Uganda, said people in Africa use drums to communicate between villages.

"The drum that I was playing, if you noticed, was fairly large. It kind of carried over the rest of the drums. The equivalent of this drum would be used for sending messages over long distances in the villages."

He said it imitates some of the sounds of words some Africans speak.

"You can play it in a different way and actually send a message to a person that is two or three miles away, and they could know exactly what you were talking about."

Ogonyo said the messages are then relayed to the next village.

"If you played, the person in the next village will play the same thing so the person in the village after that can hear it," he said. "So they relay the message from one village to another."

David Ong'any, sophomore in architecture and a native of Kenya, said he thinks many African traditions are being forgotten.

"I think our culture is being eroded a lot. These days people don't use the traditional drums. They use the drum sets that you play with the sticks.

"The kids these days don't get to hear the drumming the way our grandfathers and grandmothers did," he said. "They hear the drumming in church, which is the drum set. It is part of our culture, and people need to keep it."

Lwigale said he has been drumming since he was young.

"When I grew up, almost every family had a drum in the house. So if there is a drum and we don't have so many choices to play around with, you grab the drum and they teach you some songs and you play something."

He said people in his village still play, and it is still part of the society.

Ogonyo said the drumming traditions work very well in the villages and still are practiced there. Ong'any said drumming is not forgotten in the cities either.

"We teach our kids songs and teach them how to drum, and in turn they will teach their kids how to drum, and so even the kids there know how to drum," he said. "As long as they go to school they will learn how to drum and how to sing the traditional songs."

Faculty Senate should approve fall break proposal

After some tweaking by the Faculty Senate Academic Affairs Committee, the fall break proposal is ready for debate by the full Faculty Senate next month.

The plan, as it stands now, would create a three-day weekend in mid-October — the only vacation day between Labor Day and the Thanksgiving holiday.

Fall break should receive serious consideration, and ultimately approval, from Faculty Senate. Finally, a proposal has been created that would break the monotony of the fall semester and help students and faculty relax before the second half of the semester.

Thanks are in order to Academic Affairs Chair Rhett Trujillo and Student Body Vice President Andy Macklin, who have pushed the proposal through Student Senate and the various faculty and administrative channels. They are responsible for the proposal's success so far and should be commended for using their student leadership position to promote a plan that helps all students.

While their original idea (that included a four-day break and a Friday vacation before finals week) was a good one, the plan is even better after changes by the Faculty Academic Affairs Committee. A four-day break would have meant starting school earlier, and a reading day only would have created a bar-hopping break for many students, not study time.

But now, the proposal is at its best, and Faculty Senate should adopt it. The break won't help only students; obviously, faculty get tired after weeks of instruction in a row. A three-day fall weekend is just the right amount of time to let everyone take a break from schoolwork.

Another plus is that the three-day weekend won't mean starting the fall semester earlier, because K-State already has an extra day built into its academic calendar.

The proposed fall break is a win-win situation and an example of how the legislative process can work positively for students and faculty. Faculty senators should waste no time approving the plan when it comes up for debate next month.

SKIRTING THE ISSUE

Judge's decision in Jones/Clinton case typifies America's lax view of sexual harassment

"The President … argues that plaintiff has failed to identify the kind of clear-cut proof that Arkansas courts require for a claim of outrage … The court agrees."

— Federal District Judge Susan Webber Wright in her decision to dismiss Paula Jones' lawsuit.

Federal District Judge Susan Webber Wright's decision to dismiss the civil damage suit filed by Paula Corbin Jones reveals a severe weakness in laws governing sexual harassment.

Wright ruled that Jones' claim did not deserve a jury trial because Jones' lawyers had failed to provide enough evidence supporting her claims of sexual harassment. The legal definition of sexual harassment in Arkansas, however, leaves one yearning for more.

To meet the criteria for a claim of sexual harassment, Jones' lawyers would have had to prove she had suffered one of the following: an attack qualifying as a sexual assault, or as a result of her refusal of Clinton's supposed advances: a tangible job detriment or adverse employment action, a hostile work environment, or emotional distress or outrage. The last option would be for her lawyers to have proven that there had been a suppression of evidence relating to the incident.

Let's assume Jones' account of the incident is true on all accounts, and Bill Clinton did indeed behave "boorishly" (borrowing from Wright). While one might assume this boorish behavior constitutes a "sexual assault," remembering that rape would be considered a sexual assault, one might understand how Wright could rule that Jones did not suffer a sexual assault.

Strictly stated, Jones suffered no true detriment to her job, her most striking argument being that she did not receive a floral arrangement from her immediate supervisor for Secretary's Day, even though all other employees in her office did.

Because the hotel-room incident was isolated, and she did not suffer adverse employment consequences, she had no strong evidence she had suffered through a hostile work environment.

The question of emotional distress or outrage, suffered by the victim, however, reveals the heart of the weakness of the law. How should society expect a person to feel, after they were flashed by their boss and then propositioned? Perhaps a different spin gives the question greater effect. How would you feel if your mother's superior exposed himself to her and propositioned her? Or even, how would you feel if your husband's supervisor lifted her skirt and propositioned him?

Wright's dismissal of Jones' claim because she couldn't demonstrate "outrage" is egregious. How is someone supposed to evidence claims of this nature, when most would understand that the purpose of the law is to protect members of society from acts such as this, because of the intrinsic outrageousness of such behavior?

The weakness in these collective criteria is the frustrating efficiency with which they allow people in power to continuously behave in this "boorish" manner, so long as they follow a simple game plan. Whether Clinton has consciously done as much or not, the accusations against him weave an interesting tapestry, because they illustrate how easily this could be done, and done successfully.

Even if every single accusation of sexual misconduct against Clinton were proven to be true, he would not necessarily be guilty of sexual harassment. In nearly every instance, Clinton's accuser maintains that the incident was isolated, and resulted in no significant negative repercussions employment-wise, but in every instance the victim did not desire the affections of the president, and was offended by his actions.

A person using a position of power over another to facilitate unwanted sexual advance. That's the very nature of sexual harassment, right?

Granted, more severe cases are imaginable, but it's discouraging to think that the spirit of the law might be wholly violated by someone who is still considered to have acted according to the letter of the law.

The nastiness of the Jones court battle, with its tidal waves of salacious accusations, illustrates exactly why a different interpretation of these criteria is needed. Were someone to flash you in a bar while making aggressive unwanted come-ons, one would not have to prove there were any secondary consequences, rather, the case would be tried on the truth of the allegations.

It seems odd that in an employment situation, where an inequality in the relationship exists by nature, the victims (necessarily the people of lesser stature in the hierarchy), must meet a more substantial burden of proof and risk having their reputations smeared by lawyers defending the accused.

Anita Hill's accusations during the Clarence Thomas Supreme Court nomination hearings brought sexual harassment law to a position of legitimacy in the American consciousness.

I hope Jones' case, whether ultimately successful or not, will serve to catalyze a strengthening of such laws so that "boorish, offensive" behavior will no longer fall outside their boundaries.

New currency might unite diverse Europe

The first thing they want to do when you get to a foreign country is exchange money. I give them perfectly good American dollars, and they give me back something that looks like birthday napkins for a 5-year-old.

Every country has a different exchange rate and a different set of prices for merchandise. I forget — is it 12 bobos to the gazinga or 16 gazingas to the zulu? Finally, it gets to the point where I show my money and say, "Take it. I'm a moron." Needless to say, I end up losing a considerable amount. It slides through my fingers like Monopoly money.

Apparently, Europeans themselves are having the same problem. On Jan. 1, 1999, Europe will undergo one of its biggest changes in history. One of the most diverse areas of the world will become unified under a single currency. Is this good for tourists? Yes. It saves countless hours trying to understand exchange rates and decipher foreign bills.

VIEWPOINT

SCOTT HOPPER

Scott is a junior in psychology. You can send e-mail to Scott at hoppa@ksu.edu

Is this good for Europeans? Possibly in the long run, but in the short term it might bring economic hardship to stable countries such as Germany. During my humble investigation last week, I found that most citizens are naive or blatantly negative toward the unification. In eight months, the majority of western Europe will lose a bit of its individuality. Time will tell whether this union will be good for Europe or bad for the world.

The uniting of Europe has been prophesied by some as one of the last signs before the coming in the Book of Revelations. "No one will be able to compete with Europe. They would run the world."

Before we go to our underground shelters and wait for the second coming, a closer examination is in order. The European Union, as of now, is a loosely connected economic federation. The new money will be one of the few unifying forces. Countries still will still retain their own economies and merchandise will be priced differently throughout the EU. What costs 2 ECU, the name of the new money, in Italy, will likely cost 5 ECU in Germany.

> "THE MONEY UNIFICATION, THE MAIN TOPIC IN MOST EUROPEAN MAGAZINES, WILL CAUSE AN ECONOMIC UPROAR FOR THE AREA. IT WOULD BE AS IF THE UNITED STATES AND LATIN AMERICA AGREED TO HAVE A COMMON CURRENCY."

In the midst of this history-making event is the blatant ignorance and dissension involved with the new ECU. A recent poll by The Economist, a popular British money magazine, revealed that 90 percent of Italians support the unification, but only 15 percent know the name of the new money. That is, most people support it but don't even know the most basic aspect of the unification. Keep in mind, this new money will be used in about eight months. If America was changing the dollar to something else, I would be interested.

England, one of the main powerhouses in the EU, has refused to be a part of the money unification during the first wave. England might choose to convert, later but they are not anxious to give up the pound. Whether its reasons rely on pessimism or stubbornness, it has doubts about the working ability of the ECU.

The money unification, the main topic in most European magazines, will cause an economic uproar for the area. It would be as if the United States and Latin America agreed to have a common currency. I believe Jan. 1 will be the onset of chaos as the EU scrambles to piece together and coordinate this ingenious economic idea. What does all this mean for the United States? Not much at first, but once the EU gets on its feet, it will be a force to be reckoned with. Additional countries might join the EU as it becomes stable.

The fact that such an incredible change is widely misunderstood or opposed among its citizens is stunning. Many countries will lose a bit of their individuality in the name of progress. This might be where the sentiment begins, but it is a bit more deep-seated than that. The Belgians are not personally fond of the Germans, as are the French and the British. Suddenly becoming economic partners is a scary proposition to an area that was plagued by war only 50 years ago.

Time will tell what this common currency will mean for Europe and the world. One thing is for certain — change is coming. Does the average citizen understand the change and endorse it? Did they ever have a choice? Whether they do or don't, in about eight months the German Mark, the Belgian Franc and a number of European currencies will cease to exist, giving way to the new and improved ECU.

Tickets should cost same regardless of wallet size

Editor,

I just received my renewal form for season tickets for Wildcat football. I jumped a little at the $198 price tag, but the addition of the seventh game took some of the shock away (will this price go down when there are only six home games in a season?) As I continued to read the renewal form, I noticed a note typed on the bottom of the form:

"NOTE: Beginning with the year 2000 football season, seat location at KSU Stadium will be determined by level of support to the Ahearn Scholarship Fund."

Whoa! Excuse me? I called up the ticket office to question this note and got the response, "... this change is for the loyalty and contributions of K-State fans."

How do you measure loyalty? I was there when our homecoming theme was to beat the spread against OU. (The spread was 53, OU won 53-3.) I was there when they were begging us to come to the stadium (for free) for the games.

I was there during the Sports Illustrated bonfire when they ranked us at 103, below Wichita State University at 102. (And it doesn't have a football team.) I don't remember those chairbacks being filled by K-State fans during the late '80s and early '90s. The only section of purple in the seas of red that washed in on Saturdays was the student section. It isn't loyalty they are measuring, it is the size of your wallet. I do not have the greatest tickets now. I sit in the south side of the stadium behind the goal posts, directly behind the Nebraska and Texas fans when they come to Manhattan. (They don't like me too well.) But I haven't complained. In fact, the seat improved with the addition of the Jumbotron.

Now I am complaining. It appears I will lose my season tickets to someone who can afford the amounts of cash to kick me out of my seat and possibly the stadium. They stated fan loyalty. What about their loyalty to the fans?

It appears that if I want to keep my season tickets, I will have to deny and apologize to the College of Engineering when they call me for a donation because it went toward an athletic scholarship fund.

Chili's plans July opening

▶ RESTAURANT BRINGS POSSIBLE INTERNSHIPS; ATMOSPHERE WELCOMES K-STATE MEMORABILIA.

ANDREW WIMMER
Kansas State Collegian

Manhattan will be home to a new restaurant July 30, when Chili's Grill & Bar is tentatively scheduled to open its franchise here.

Chili's is owned by Dallas-based Brinker International, which also operates Macaroni Grille and several other restaurant chains. Construction already has begun on the restaurant, which will be near the intersection of Tuttle Creek Boulevard and Kansas Highway 177 in the Manhattan Town Center parking lot.

Dave Ubhoff, managing partner for Chili's, said he will bring four managers from his Overland Park, Kan. location and hire 90 to 100 employees for the new restaurant.

"We think we will have a big impact on Manhattan economy," Ubhoff said. "Hiring that many people out of this type of community will really help out the area."

> "WE THINK WE WILL HAVE A BIG IMPACT ON MANHATTAN ECONOMY."
> DAVE UBHOFF
> managing partner for Chili's

Ubhoff said Brinker International has had success in satellite cities like Manhattan.

"The Lawrence location has really taken off," he said. "If all things go well, we plan on opening other locations in towns like Salina and Hays."

The 6,000-square-foot facility will accommodate 220 dining patrons. Ubhoff said Chili's is famous for its salads, steaks and "guiltless grill" selections, for those who are watching what they eat.

"All of our selections are excellent," he said. "There is not one item that I am not proud to serve to customers."

Besides a capacity of 220 in the dining room, Chili's will feature a small bar area full of K-State memorabilia and televisions for sports fans.

"We are catering to a college and military town," he said. "We plan on being especially busy this fall with K-State's purple football fans."

Ubhoff said Chili's already is looking into how it can affect Manhattan positively.

"Chili's wants to be an active member in the community," Ubhoff said. "We are in the preliminary discussions with the university about setting up an internship program with hotel and restaurant management students. We also plan on having special events including college students and Manhattan residents.

"We are really excited about coming to Manhattan," he said.

K-State offers rare degree opportunity

KELLY REDDING
Kansas State Collegian

K-State offers something no other school in the world offers: a bachelor of science degree in milling science.

"This is a unique department," said Walter Eustace, professor of grain science and industry. "It is the only one of its kind in the world."

Milling science involves breaking a grain or oil seed down into its separate parts and the techniques involved in that process.

"It's basically making wheat into flour," Eustace said. "Most people think that flour is just something that is down the second aisle on the third shelf at the grocery store, but it's more than that.

"We teach our students the fundamentals of the process, and it's a difficult process with all the specifications placed on it."

> "IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND IN THE WORLD."
> WALTER EUSTACE
> professor of grain science and industry

Eustace said there is a demand for students who major in milling science but not all students go to work in mills. Some students go into other careers related to milling.

"A lot of people think that it's just working in a hot and dusty flour mill," he said. "Actually, a lot of mills are well-ventilated and clean. Students can also go into sales, quality control, management or marketing."

Eustace said the reason milling science isn't offered at more schools is money.

He said it would cost $4 million to $5 million to duplicate the mill.

Jeff Gwirtz, instructor of grain science and industry, said he tries to help his students prepare for work before they graduate.

"We try and provide the students with opportunities for summer jobs and internships," he said. "It helps them make a decision on their career and see what the production environment is like."

Gwirtz said it was a better way for students to get used to the work world.

"We like to help them hit the bricks running," he said.

Gwirtz said there will always be a need for students in the milling field.

"There is tremendous opportunity for our students," he said. "There's an applied fundamental need. After all, we all need to eat."

Asbury signs 2 recruits on 1st day of men's basketball signing period

K-State head basketball coach Tom Asbury announced today the signing of two players to national letters of intent on the first day of the men's basketball spring signing period.

Community college transfer Cortez Groves and local high school star Travis Reynolds both will join K-State for the 1998-99 season.

Reynolds, from nearby Junction City Senior High, is a 6-foot-7-inch, 200-pound forward. Groves, a 6-foot-5-inch, 185-pound guard from Raytown, Mo., has played at Moberly (Mo.) Community College the past two seasons.

Reynolds led the I-70 League in scoring (19.7 points per game) and rebounding (9.7 rebounds per game) as a senior, and the Junction City Bluejays finished the year with an 18-5 record to earn a trip to the Kansas 6A state tournament.

He had a season-high 36 points against Salina Central and recorded a season-best 18 rebounds against Salina South.

Reynolds was an AP second-team All-State selection and first-team All-Class 6A selection by the Topeka Capitol-Journal. He was team MVP and an All I-70 selection twice. As a senior he was a McDonald's All-America Team nominee.

Originally from Palatka, Fla., Reynolds played in Junction City for two seasons. He shot 53.3 percent from the field as a senior and 62.1 percent from the foul line. He was second in the I-70 League in steals with 2.17 a game. In addition to scoring and rebounding, he led the Bluejays in charges taken and blocked shots (55).

"I think Travis is the best player in Kansas when you look at his size," said Felix Grimmett, Junction City head coach. "He is such an athlete. He runs the floor and can block shots. He has the whole package.

"For us he had to play inside, but at K-State he will have no problem stepping out on the wing. He is an excellent outside shooter."

Reynolds chose K-State from a list of nine schools: Oklahoma State, Nebraska, Kansas, Texas A&M, Florida State, New Mexico, Clemson and Creighton, Grimmett said.

Groves, who suffered through ankle and groin injuries for most of his sophomore season, averaged 11.7 points and 3.2 rebounds and 4.0 assists for Moberly (15-16). Groves led the team to an 18-13 record in Region 16 as a freshman, averaging 13.5 points per game.

"He has been a solid player for us," said Kenny Seifert, head coach at Moberly. "He has been explosive at times. He has hit games where he really got on a roll offensively. He is a rhythm player. If he gets in a good rhythm he is going to do well.

"He has a great work ethic and works hard in practice. He is coachable, wants to learn and get better. That is one of the things I most enjoyed about him."

Seifert said Groves is getting the chance he has worked for as a community college player.

"He is excited about going to K-State," Seller said. "He has always wanted to play for them. I am tickled to death he is going to get that opportunity."

Asbury said each player will have ample opportunities to contribute next season.

"We are very pleased to be adding these two guys into our program," Asbury said. "Both are good athletes, and both bring a variety of skills to our program.

"We look for Cortez to provide immediate help at the off-guard spot," Asbury said. "He may not have had the type of year that he or we anticipated, but he is a good defender and the type of player we expect to step in and help us.

"Travis is a kid we think will have a bright future here," Asbury said.

K-State men's golf team posts best finish of year in Arkansas

The K-State men's golf team completed its third tournament of the spring season with a 10th-place finish at the Arkansas State Indian Invitational in Jonesboro, Ark. K-State was paced by Brian Racette who finished third with a 78. The sophomore finished the round in a tie for 29th place, shooting 14-over-par for the tournament after back-to-back rounds of 76 Monday.

In the team competition, K-State finished the tournament 10th out of 18 teams by shooting 306-299-319 — 924. The 10th-place finish is the highest for Coach Tim Norris' team this spring.

K-State will be in action Monday and Tuesday in Wichita for the Diet Pepsi/Shocker Classic. The field in Wichita will include four other Big 12 schools: Colorado, Iowa State, Missouri and Nebraska. The 54-hole tournament will be played at Crestview Country Club North and will begin at 9 a.m. Monday with 36 holes to be played. The final 18 holes on Tuesday.

Does Murphy's magical 40-yard dash time spell success for the 1998 Wildcats?

FRANK MURPHY, A COMMUNITY COLLEGE TRANSFER FROM GARDEN CITY, KAN., IS INTERVIEWED DURING A PRESS CONFERENCE TUESDAY. MURPHY, WHO WAS TIMED AT 4.21 SECONDS IN THE 40-YARD DASH, IS TRYING TO EARN THE WILDCATS' STARTING TAILBACK POSITION.

Newest Wildcat tailback sets K-State record in 40-yard dash

THE RUNDOWN

NAME: Frank Murphy
POSITION: Running back
HEIGHT: 6-1
WEIGHT: 205 lbs.
HOMETOWN: Callahan, Fla.
DATE OF BIRTH: Feb. 11, 1977

FOOTBALL FACTS

- Transfered to K-State from Garden City (Kan.) Community College.
- Named 1997 National Juco Player-of-the-Year by the National Junior College Athletic Association.
- Rushed for 1,370 yards and scored 26 touchdowns in 1997 for Garden City.
- Two of his touchdowns were on kick returns, and four were on receptions.
- Scored six touchdowns in one half of a game last season.
- Earned high school All-America honors after rushing for more than 20 touchdowns and 1,200 yards in his final season.

Speed. The addictive kind.

That's what communitry college transfer Frank Murphy will bring to the Wildcats' running back corps.

Murphy, from Garden City Community College, was rated the No. 1 community college recruit of the year. At GCCC last season, Murphy rushed for more than 1,300 yards and 20 touchdowns on his way to being named NJCAA National Player-of-the-Year.

And that speed is something coach Bill Snyder is counting on to spark the present group of running backs.

"He probably gives us more speed than at any time I can think of at this position," Snyder said. "The other guys we have are not slow, but we're talking about a real burst."

A record-breaking burst.

Murphy came in and ran a 4.21 40-yard dash. He followed that with a 4.22. He said he was happy with that, and he broke all K-State records for the 40.

"I don't think people believe I ran that at Garden," Murphy said. "That was kind of an insult. I read things in the paper like it was a second-hand time, and we haven't timed him yet."

Although he couldn't remember the name of the paper, Murphy said he used that article as motivation.

"I took that article and looked at it every day before I left the house," he said. "Before this came, I was ready."

Murphy's running style has been compared to the Detroit Lions' Barry Sanders. He shied away from the Sanders comparison, calling himself a slashing running back who likes to score.

"I really couldn't say," he said. "That's what people have said about me, and that's great, because he's a great player, I guess so."

After playing wide receiver at Itawamba Community College his freshman year, Murphy transferred to GCCC and redshirted the 1996 season. He was not allowed to practice with the team, but he worked out individually every day to stay in shape.

"People looked at me like I was stupid," he said. "I took it as a challenge."

Florida, Central Florida and South Carolina all looked at Murphy, but Florida wanted him to stay an extra semester to pick up credits that K-State didn't require in his business major.

In spring practice, the learning process begins. The Cats run some of the same offensive sets that Murphy played at GCCC, such as the I-formation. But Murphy has his favorites.

"I like to be split out because it forces the linebacker on me, which puts a bigger, tight guy on me, and I like that," he said.

Learning the system provides Murphy with the greatest challenge right now, but audibilizing is different at K-State, too.

"The challenge is learning the system. I'm getting relaxed and I feel I'll be relaxed when spring comes," he said. "I think the main difference is audibles. We didn't audible much at Garden but we audible here much longer."

Snyder said he was impressed with what hopefully will be great versatility at the position.

"I think he has the ability to run as a hard runner, but he can get on the perimeter and also reportedly has some skills in terms of the passing game," Snyder said.

But Murphy said he will keep his head on his shoulders in regards to his stiff competition. Senior running back Eric Hickson was granted another year of eligibility and senior Marlon Charles will provide competition as well.

"I come in with the attitude that I'm sitting at two or three right now, and I'm going to do whatever it takes to work my way up. If that's one or two, then that's what it means," he said. "Right now I'm sitting down low because I just got here, but my expectation is to reach the top when it's all over."

Murphy is relying on those experienced players to help him out this spring, and there are no tense feelings.

"Eric and Marlon teach me as I go, and they understand the feeling of competition," he said. "We know it's whoever's the best man, and I think that's a good attitude to have."

If he's not the main man, Murphy said he won't be upset.

"I feel it's a team thing," he said. "I feel if I work my butt off and do the right things, then I should get a chance to show my skills and if not, then I probably won't feel disappointed. I don't feel that's going to happen."

THE COMPETITION

ERIC HICKSON

Led team in rushing with 750 yards in 1997. He stands 6th on the K-State career-rushing list with 1,635 yards.

MARLON CHARLES

Tiger Woods has tough task ahead if he hopes for repeat-victory at 1998 Masters

Today, the best golf tournament in the world starts.

The Masters will be played between today and Sunday at Augusta National Golf Club.

This is the crown jewel of golf tournaments. The main thing any professional golfer wants to do, other than to represent his country in the Ryder Cup, is to pull on the green jacket on the second Sunday in April.

That means for that year, he was "The Master." He won the ultimate golf tournament in the world and tamed one of the toughest tests in golf, Augusta National.

Last year, in his first Masters as a professional, Tiger Woods tamed the course like no other. He set a tournament record score of 270 and won by 12 strokes, another record. His breathtaking distance and rock-solid putting led the way.

He made the legendary course into a pitch-and-putt, and he didn't putt too often. All week, he didn't three-putt a single green in 72 holes at Augusta, which has notoriously lightning-fast greens with inhumane breaks.

VIEWPOINT

DAN MERKER

Dan is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Dan at dmerker@ksu.edu.

The talk started. People said he'd obliterate Jack Nicklaus' record of six Masters victories, and that he might even wear the green jacket 10 or more times. People said Augusta was tailor-made for his game, and he would own the course.

It's not that simple.

Yes, Tiger Woods' distance helps him phenomenally, but he's not playing the Manhattan High golf team. He's playing the best golfers in the world, such as Tom Lehman, Jim Furyk, Greg Norman, Justin Leonard, Ernie Els, David Duval, Phil Mickelson and Lee Westwood.

If length is that much of an asset, John Daly, whose game has improved by leaps and bounds since last April, should have just as good a chance as Woods.

Winning the Masters is no simple feat. Woods is fortunate to have won one already. Norman, among the best players in the world for more than 15 years, wants worse than anything to win the Masters. He had his chance two years ago, but his legendary choke job on Sunday cost him the green jacket in perhaps his best chance to win it. His three second-place finishes are perhaps more painful than never making the cut.

Also, only two players have ever won the green jacket two years in a row — Nicklaus and Nick Faldo. As good as Woods is, to join these names, perhaps the two best players ever at Augusta, would truly take a legendary performance.

To the surprise of many, Woods has not won a tournament on the PGA Tour yet in 1998, and in the Players Championship, the richest tournament of the year, two weeks ago, Woods was less than spectacular.

Still, all everybody can talk about is Woods, wondering if he will win it again.

My question is whether he will make the cut again. Woods has a fiery temper and has the tendency to blow up, like he did at last year's British open. It also wouldn't surprise me if he tried to get too cute on the par three 12th hole, where if a shot ends up short of the pin, it is in Rae's Creek. Trying to impress the crowd and make up for several days of poor play on one shot, he will put two or three balls in the water on 12 and ruin his chances.

Woods also has had the bad habit of missing the fairway lately, which is virtual suicide at Augusta.

There are plenty of other great golfers in the world who are both capable and deserving of winning the Masters. Being overlooked by Woods will give them the perfect atmosphere for otherwise big names to sneak up on the golf world and take home the green jacket.

My pick to do so is Justin Leonard.

CNS to relocate for dance studios

JOSHUA STURGILL
Kansas State Collegian

Computing and Network Services offices are in the process of relocating to make room for the construction of new dance studios in Nichols Hall.

Ken Conrow, associate director of CNS, said a few offices have already been moved, including consulting group head Larry Robertson, whose office is now in Hale 313.

By June 1, the Systems and Network group plans to move to a location west of the machine room in the basement of Hale Library. Conrow said this area just recently been cleared and is being re-constructed for use by CNS.

The business group, as well as the World Wide Web support and local area network support groups also hope to relocate by June 1 to space in the Foundation Center formerly used as a cafeteria.

Conrow said because of outside factors the June 1 deadline is tentative.

"They are just now contracting for carpets for the new rooms in Hale," he said. "And construction of dance floors will begin soon in Nichols so dance classes can be moved from Ahearn before next semester, so things are very hectic."

Conrow said students and faculty who need assistance from CNS will be able to take advantage of new programs available through the consulting group in Hale 313. This office will be converted into a "help desk."

"Questions about technologies, CNS or teaching oriented programs can be addressed to the help desk by phone, fax or e-mail," Conrow said.

David Procter, head of the Department of Speech Communication, Theater and Dance, said the dance studios in Ahearn Field House need to be upgraded, and the chance to move into Nichols is a tremendous opportunity.

"We are finally going to have all our faculty and programs in the same building," he said.

Procter said there will be four new multi-purpose theater/dance studios and space for three faculty offices when the renovation is complete.

The university has given $150,000 for the project, and Procter said the department hopes to match that amount in private fund raising.

Construction for the studios will begin around May 15 and end Aug. 1.

GOP to review congressional hearings

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Anticipating a report from Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr, House Speaker Newt Gingrich recently tapped a freshman Republican to review the multiple congressional hearings on alleged Clinton administration wrongdoing.

Rep. James Rogan of California, a former judge, will research what has gone well for Republicans who ran those hearings and what pitfalls to avoid in the future. He learned of his new task in calls from Gingrich's office and the office of House Judiciary Committee Chairman Henry Hyde, R-Ill.

But Gingrich himself informed the public about Rogan's assignment, disclosing it in a newspaper interview that appeared the next morning.

This minor episode underscores Gingrich's personal involvement in preparations for what many Republicans believe is coming their way as soon as next month: a politically explosive report by Starr detailing evidence of possible impeachable offenses by President Clinton.

Given that Starr's report might be coming, Gingrich said in a recent interview, "as a prudent person you have a fiduciary responsibility to make sure the legislative branch is prepared."

Thus far, the Georgia Republican said, the issue takes perhaps an hour of his time a week — a small fraction of what he estimates is a 90-hour work week. And he and his aides stressed that Hyde, a veteran lawmaker who wins bipartisan praise for fairness, is the GOP point man on the issue.

Even some Republicans see a potential political negative to Gingrich's involvement. He's been a handy target for Democrats in the past and would be a logical one again, they concede, if the White House and its allies accuse the GOP of mounting a political attack on a popular president.

"He's gone to great lengths to undermine" Hyde, contends Rep. Martin Frost of Texas, who chairs the Democratic campaign committee.

Evidence of Gingrich's involvement is apparent at several key turns.

The speaker personally approved $1.3 million in additional funding for the Judiciary Committee recently. Hyde sought the funds last winter to oversee the Justice Department, but he now says the money will give him and his staff latitude to prepare for any report from Starr.

Officials say Hyde briefed Gingrich before selecting former organized crime prosecutor David Schippers to a new senior committee post — a job that could easily land him in the middle of an impeachment review.

According to several Republican sources, Gingrich has expressed keen interest in hiring a credible, experienced press spokesperson with some of the funds Hyde received. These officials say that reflects the speaker's view that Republicans should gird for a public relations battle no matter how they respond to Starr's report.

Hyde says the speaker has "given me free rein" in hiring.

Gingrich also had met with both Hyde and Charles Johnson, the House parliamentarian, and a close circle of aides to discuss the never-before-used section of the independent counsel law that deals with the submission of evidence of potentially impeachable offenses.

He has kept alive the possibility of creating a select committee rather than the Judiciary Committee to handle any impeachment review. And in planning discussions, Gingrich and Hyde have discussed possibly establishing a small bipartisan task force to pre-review Starr's material.

Gingrich has excluded other House GOP leaders — and House Minority Leader Dick Gephardt, D-Mo. — from the planning.

Gingrich has stressed a determination to follow the letter of the law at a time when the House is likely to be whipsawed by pressures from Clinton's Democratic defenders on one side and a vocal group of the president's harshest critics among conservative Republicans on the other.

"He doesn't want there to be a carnival," says Rep. John Linder, a fellow Georgia Republican.

Attorneys paint pictures of battling Koch brothers

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The multimillionaire Koch brothers on opposite sides of a federal lawsuit will not even acknowledge each other's presence when they sit a few feet apart in a courtroom.

Attorneys gave radically different pictures Wednesday to jurors of who was to blame — Charles Koch, the 62-year-old chairman of the company founded by the father of the four brothers, or Bill Koch, at 57 perhaps best known for winning yachting's America's Cup six years ago.

Bill Koch, the youngest brother by minutes, and Frederick Koch, 64, the oldest brother, and other former stockholders are suing. The defendants include Koch Industries, Charles Koch and David Koch, 57, Bill Koch's older twin brother.

The attorneys made their opening statements, and testimony is scheduled to begin today. The trial could last seven weeks.

An attorney for the former stockholders told jurors Charles Koch's desire to control Koch Industries was so strong he stifled dissent and participated in an effort to cheat his own brothers in a 1983 stock sale.

An attorney for the defendants said Koch Industries was fair with the dissident stockholders after their abortive attempt to take over the company. He said Bill Koch has continued a bitter family conflict.

Koch Industries is the nation's second-largest privately owned corporation, behind agribusiness giant Cargill, and $1 billion could be at stake in the U.S. District Court lawsuit.

Fred Bartlit, of Chicago, lead attorney for Bill Koch and his fellow plaintiffs, said the case is about "one man's need for total control," that person being Charles Koch.

"When you have power a long time, it can turn your head a lot," Bartlit said. "Unchecked power is not a good thing, anywhere."

Robert Howard, of Wichita, the defendants' lead attorney, said the case is the story of how Charles Koch, Koch Industries and its officers tried to make peace with dissident stockholders.

"It's a dispute that arose out of family strife and family conflict," Howard told jurors. "We thought we had purchased peace at a price of $1.1 billion. That price was fair then. It's fair now."

Bill Koch, Frederick Koch and other dissident stockholders sold their shares of stock in 1983, for nearly $1.1 billion. Bill Koch's share of the settlement was $470 million.

The plaintiffs contend Koch Industries withheld information, misleading the sellers into accepting a price for their stock that was too low.

Bartlit portrayed events as stemming from Charles Koch's anger about having his decisions as Koch chairman questioned.

"Charles will remove anyone who disagrees with him — freeze them out, buy them out cheap," Bartlit said. "You only get one chance with Charles Koch. You cross him, and you're on the blacklist forever.

"These are smart people, and you may be sitting there wondering, 'How did they think they would get away with it?' Power goes to your head."

Howard described Bill Koch and dissident stockholders as difficult in dealings about issues involving Koch's stock.

He said the dissidents were complaining that stock dividends were too low, and their constant theme was "Show me the money."

He said the company grew dramatically under Charles Koch, profiting stockholders handsomely.

"His philosophy for the company was not paying cash out and living a lavish lifestyle," Howard said. "His philosophy was growing the company."

Howard said Koch essentially is trying to get a higher price for his stock through litigation.

"When you've heard all the evidence in this case, you're going to understand why the plaintiffs knew exactly what they were doing," Howard said.

USDA investigates Disney's kingdom

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ORLANDO, Fla. — Disney, which produced "Bambi" and "The Lion King," is being scrutinized about the deaths of several animals at its newest theme park.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture is investigating Walt Disney World in the deaths of four cheetah cubs, two rhinos, two hippos and four other creatures at or en route to the entertainment giant's new Animal Kingdom.

"This isn't a movie they're making, this is real life," said Joe Taksel, a spokesman for the Animal Rights Foundation of Florida.

Taksel's group plans a protest at the April 22 opening of the park, which will feature 1,000 exotic animals.

Disney is being pressured to put the final touches on the $800 million, 500-acre theme park. It will fly in 5,000 reporters, analysts and travel planners for the opening.

USDA spokesman Jim Rogers said the investigation was started after the agency received an anonymous tip, but he wouldn't say what inspectors are looking for.

The USDA, which has the power to fine an animal exhibitor or take away its license, previously had reviewed most of the deaths and found no violations of federal animal welfare regulations. Disney officials said Wednesday they've done nothing wrong.

"We know that our animals receive the best care, live in a superior habitat and are cared for by a highly qualified and dedicated team of animal-care experts," said Disney spokesman Bill Warren.

Top conservation groups, including Wildlife Conservation Society, are behind the project. State regulators also cleared the park this week in the deaths.

"Certainly 12 animals dying is a concern, but then again you need to look at the circumstances, and none of these circumstances were related," said Capt. Jerry Thompson, statewide inspections coordinator for the Florida Game and Fresh Water Fish Commission. "The way they died was not unusual for captive wildlife."

Last September, a female black rhinoceros died from a perforated intestine caused by a stick the animal had eaten. Disney said the animal ate the stick before coming to Animal Kingdom.

The four cheetahs died in late December of kidney failure; ethylene, an ingredient used in antifreeze and solvents, was found in their systems. Disney said the cubs had only been at Animal Kingdom a few days.

A female hippopotamus died in February from multiple infections after being there for only a few weeks. The infections probably were caused earlier, Disney said.

• A 48-year-old hippopotamus died of cardiac arrest in March while it was being transported from an Oklahoma City zoo to Animal Kingdom.

Play marks return of Ebony Theatre

After two years of inactivity, Ebony Theatre Company has been resuscitated with "The Sutherland," a play by Charles Smith.

Marci Maullar, associate professor of theater, said about two years ago was the last time a student of color had the desire to direct Ebony Theatre.

"We had one theater student who had the background to direct, but she graduated, so we needed to find the next student to take over. Donna Davenport was very excited about the idea of directing, so she started searching for plays," Maullar said.

Maullar said the program is unique to the area.

"We are the only school in the region who's had a theater group specifically for students of color. Our theater program can't support the work this special group does," she said.

Maullar also said the program fills a special role within the community.

"It's a way to show support for black literature and an outlet in which we can provide the student and university communities with work that has often been overlooked," she said.

Davenport, director of "The Sutherland," said she became interested in directing in Ebony Theatre when she noticed the lack of voice for minorities on campus, but there was another very compelling reason for her to take over.

"We would have lost our funding this year if we didn't do anything. We need this to give playwrights, actors and characters and those in the margins a voice," she said.

Although her reasons for directing serve other people's needs, this is also something Davenport feels she needs to do for herself.

"I needed more for my art in theater. It is something I felt I had to do," she said.

Maullar said the Department of Speech Communication, Theater and Dance is still searching for a faculty member to permanently take over the reins of Ebony Theatre.

"We are very interested in keeping it going. Ideally, we'll hire a faculty member of color who could serve as the adviser to this as well as serving in other capacities within the department," Maullar said.

After deciding to perform "The Sutherland," Smith, the playwright, was contacted to come conduct lectures on his work.

"While the play I'm currently working on is important, I love working with students, and if there is any way I can help them I want to," Smith said.

Smith also said the work done by Ebony Theatre cannot be done by the department unless it makes a concerted effort to fill the same role. He also said Ebony Theatre is an important way to celebrate ethnic differences.

"If we lived in a society that was color blind, there wouldn't be any need to pay attention to differences. The differences are what makes us lively and distinguishes us from one another," he said. "It is sad that some people are threatened by differences in culture, but there is nothing to be threatened about by celebrating individuality."

Speech gives playwright opportunity to explain ins and outs of drama

Charles Smith, writer of "The Sutherland," to be presented April 9-11 in the Purple Masque Theatre, spoke of his work as a playwright on Monday.

"Drama isn't cut and dry. My plays stem from situations and ideas that I want to explore," he said.

Smith said that when writing, he starts with what the play is about.

"When you understand conflict, everything falls into place. You develop a series of images that serve that end and a series of images that are in conflict with it. It is really almost the opposite of improv," he said.

Smith said he believes all plays that are written are historically based. The question is what one considers to be history.

"My idea might be different than yours. My idea of history is a bit looser. It is really a mix of historical research and the ideas in my own mind," he said.

Smith said he has had good experiences with the theaters that have produced his plays and has been able to control the artistic product.

"A play is like a music score, it is written to be performed. The playwright has to be in rehearsals. Some theaters are afraid they'll do something wrong and don't know how best to use a writer. I don't work with those theaters," he said.

Smith said when theaters have done his plays but he has not worked with them, they have generally turned out much different that he imagined them, but this does not really bother him.

"Something is lost, but you've gained something else. No matter who does it, it's going to be different. It allows for other interpretive artists to work," he said.

Smith said he used to try to remove himself from his plays but gave up because he never has been able to accomplish this yet.

"I know I'll always be in there somewhere. Even times when I was sure I wasn't, someone else could pick me out in a character. I've had some pretty intimate relationships with characters that are supposed to be fictional," he said.

Christian group provides Bible studies, enhances learning of principles

JOHNNY KING
Special to the Kansas State Collegian

This is a continuing informational series about religion on campus written by campus advisers to religious groups at K-State.

The Apostolic Campus Ministry has been a campus Christian group for about seven years. The membership consists of K-State students and staff members and individuals from out of the community.

Our main purpose is to provide group and individual Bible studies designed to enhance the Christian experience of anyone who is interested.

Our teaching is based on the doctrine taught by Jesus Christ to his original 12 apostles, hence our name. These apostles were the ones who He used to spread his gospel to the world.

Based on Biblical facts, here are some of our beliefs:

There is a powerful and intimate life changing experience that can be received by anyone today based on complete obedience To the Word of God. II Corinthians 5:17

In order to experience what was mentioned above we must be born again. Acts Chapter 2 and John 3:5

Baptism in the name of Jesus by immersion is part of being born again and is necessary. John 3:5 and I Peter 3:21

Overcoming sin is a promise to a believer. Acts 1:8 and Romans 8:37

Jesus is coming back. I Thessalonians 4:16-17

Believers and unbelievers will be judged. Revelation 20:12 and II Corinthians 5:10-11

You can find more information on what we believe by going to our table set up in the K-State Union between 11 a.m. and 1 p.m. Fridays. There are fliers posted around campus about our group and its events.

You can get involved by attending our exciting bible study sessions every Monday night at 8 p.m. in the Union.

We also encourage you to attend our church here in town on the corner of Juliette Avenue and Vattier Street or the one in Junction City — Faith Tabernacle at 1010 Burke Drive and Eisenhower.

Graves' tax proposal passes in Kansas House, Senate

▶$246 MILLION TAX CUT PASSES BY 123-0, 39-1 VOTES IN LEGISLATURE.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — After weeks of impasse on various tax-cutting plans, the Legislature on Wednesday sent Gov. Bill Graves the quarter-billion dollar tax-relief package he had unveiled only a day earlier.

The quick action followed Graves' proposal for nearly $246 million in tax cuts, rather than the $170 million he proposed in January.

Graves revised his plan because economists said the state's finances in coming months will be rosier than first thought.

The House passed the proposal on a 123-0 vote.

The Senate followed suit, sending it to Graves on a 39-1 vote.

The governor said Kansas taxpayers are the clear winners.

"The overwhelming support from both chambers for these tax cuts speaks to the strength of the Kansas economy and to the accomplishments that can be achieved with perseverance, hard work and cooperation," he said.

The bill reduces state revenues by $245.9 million in the budget year beginning July 1 — the largest single tax cut in state history, and the fourth consecutive tax reduction since Graves took office in 1995.

The biggest chunk is $70.5 million to cut the statewide property tax for public schools to 20 mills from 27 mills, followed by $36.3 million to increase personal income tax exemptions from $2,000 to $2,250.

For House members and Graves, tax relief is something they can tout in re-election campaigns this year.

GRAVES

It has enough elements that virtually all sides can claim some measure of victory.

"From the very beginning, the House has insisted any tax relief would apply to those who need it most and provide meaningful relief," said Rep. Phill Kline, R-Shawnee, the House's lead tax negotiator.

House Minority Leader Tom Sawyer, D-Wichita, said inheritance tax changes in the bill provided "too much for too few" and lamented that sales tax wasn't removed from food.

But he supported passage, saying, "This is the best we can get this year."

On the other side of the Statehouse, several senators praised the tax-relief plan.

"This provides tax relief for all our diverse constituencies ... while providing low-income families with much needed tax relief," said Sen. Audrey Langworthy, R-Prairie Village, the Senate's top tax negotiator.

The only person voting against the bill was Sen. Ben Vidricksen, R-Salina, who said the state has been ignoring needed repairs to its buildings and infrastructure.

"I see no movement toward these needs. I will continue to vote no on large tax-relief measures until our needs are met," Vidricksen said.

Earlier Wednesday, Senate Republicans agreed during a closed-door meeting to support Graves' plan without tinkering with it because it basically included something for everyone.

For instance, conservatives wanted a bigger mill levy reduction and got it when Graves went from a four-mill cut in January to a seven-mill reduction in his latest proposal.

"We have a bill for all Kansans," said Sen. Stan Clark, R-Oakley, a conservative.

"This plan is bold, aggressive and historic."

Others also got what they wanted — a sales tax exemption for residential remodeling, scrapping of the state's inheritance tax and adopting the federal estate tax, and removing the marriage penalty on income tax filers.

House and Senate negotiators had been at an impasse for weeks about tax relief with each chamber trading variations of the same theme — ranging from $182 million to $225 million.

Finally, Graves weighed in with his offer to get an agreement as lawmakers moved into the final days of their regular session.

Graves' plan was announced Tuesday at $251.8 million. But $5.4 million of that is money to be shared with local governments, and it will be in another bill. Other refinements reduced the Graves package another $500,000.

Graves also proposed a $22.5 million increase in spending on public schools, but that will be dealt with in an omnibus appropriations bill to be considered when the Legislature returns April 29 for a scheduled four-day wrap-up session.

Student Senate passed the original idea unanimously, but the reading day and one day of fall break were voted down by Faculty Senate's Academic Affairs Committee.

"I guess the faculty thought students might take advantage of this free day before finals and use the day to do things other than study," he said. "That might be true for some students, but I think others could really benefit from having this extra day to study before finals start.

"I would definitely like to try this idea again within the next two years."

Trujillo said the fall break proposal recently has been accepted at the University of Kansas.

"I think if they can do it, we shouldn't have a problem with it either," he said.

For now, the proposal would create a three-day weekend the third week in October. Because K-State's calendar is now one day longer than the Kansas Board of Regents' required 75 academic days, school wouldn't need to start earlier in the fall.

"Since we have 76 days a semester and we only need 75, we would be cutting out that extra day and using it as part of the three-day break," Trujillo said.

He said once the decision is passed, there still will be other hurdles in making it effective. One hurdle would be submitting the change to the academic calendar.

"The regents usually develop the academic calendar five years in advance to the actual school year, so right now they're already working on the 2002-2003 school year," he said.

Macklin said the break could take effect next year because it doesn't affect the academic calendar, which already has an extra day during the fall semester.

He said faculty should take a serious look at the proposal.

"I think for now we have a good start and the faculty should really consider this proposal," Macklin said.

Tobacco companies to fight legislation

The initial announcement came from Steven Goldstone, the chief executive officer of RJR Nabisco Inc., the parent company of R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., in a speech at the National Press Club.

Shortly afterward, Philip Morris, Lorillard Inc. and Brown & Williamson said they back Goldstone's position. U.S. Tobacco Co. did not offer an immediate announcement.

Goldstone told the National Press Club, "I have told my colleagues in the industry that effective today I no longer see any purpose in working toward the June 20th national settlement," a reference to the agreement negotiated last year with 40 states.

He said that while he stands behind last year's agreement, "I see no possibility in this environment to achieve it."

Before Goldstone's announcement, Clinton was asked in Chicago about speculation that RJR would not support the $506 billion tobacco bill. Clinton told reporters, "It certainly does not prohibit Congress from taking action to try to reduce teen smoking."

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said the public demands action with or without the industry's support and Congress must pass a bill to achieve that goal. "I think we are a long way from quote, 'falling apart,'" he said.

Minnesota Attorney General Hubert Humphrey III told CNN, "The fact is Congress doesn't need this outlawed industry's permission to enact comprehensive legislation that's going to protect our kids and the public health."

Goldstone said the legislative effort was "broken beyond repair" and that because of the roadblocks in Congress, last year's settlement with the states now "is dead." He said the legislative package could bankrupt his company.

The proposal being fashioned by McCain would require the tobacco firms to pay $506 billion, much more than the $368 billion deal reached last summer, without providing full protection from smokers' lawsuits.

Other tobacco companies also said they would no longer work toward moving a comprehensive deal through Congress.

Philip Morris said in a statement: "We regret that a historic opportunity to resolve decades-old controversies surrounding tobacco has been lost." The company said it would actively oppose the bill in Congress.

Lorillard Inc. said: "It would be irresponsible — to our customers and our company — to agree to the kind of proposals now before Congress."

Brown & Williamson blamed partisan politics and insufficient White House leadership for dashing hopes of achieving a workable deal in Congress. "Congress wants us to sign a suicide note," said Nicholas Brookes, company chairman.

U.S. Tobacco could not immediately be reached for comment.

White House spokesman Mike McCurry said Goldstone's remarks reflect the tobacco industry's desire to keep Congress from passing tough legislation.

He predicted the companies will eventually soften their stance, "because they have a poor record when it comes to public health.

"It's a mark of how serious the effort is in Congress ... that the industry wants to put its foot down at this point," McCurry said.

"It would be a tragedy for America's children if the tobacco industry succeeds in blocking this legislation."

Reno asked to investigate King's assassination

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The widow of Martin Luther King Jr. presented new evidence to Attorney General Janet Reno in an appeal for another investigation of her husband's assassination.

After Wednesday's two-hour private meeting in her Justice Department conference room, Reno said, "We will carefully review the questions and information they presented, and I will be in touch with them as soon as the review is complete."

"We presented new evidence that has come to our attention about the assassination of my husband," Coretta Scott King told reporters afterwards. "She listened very sympathetically."

The evidence included "new witnesses coming forth that had never been investigated," Coretta King said, but she would not elaborate.

She said she proposed a national commission with the power to subpoena evidence, to grant immunity and to prosecute, "because all this evidence needs to be presented to an official body."

She was accompanied by her son, Dexter; Andrew Young, former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations; and former District of Columbia congressional delegate Walter Fauntroy. Reno brought Deputy Attorney General Eric Holder, Associate Attorney General Raymond Fisher and other aides to the meeting.

"The attorney general did not want to commit to anything specific, but we didn't expect an answer today," Dexter King said.

"The fact that we were here today speaks volumes about the fact that it was not immediately written off or discredited."

Young said Reno did not say how soon she would get back to the King family.

about how to teach children."

Riedesel said she also benefits from tutoring.

"It doesn't take much of my time, and I think it helps the kids out a lot. Just knowing that they've got a little extra attention that they might not have normally gotten makes it worth while," Riedesel said.

Cullers said she thought helping children makes the program worthwhile, and she already has begun to make plans for expanding the program.

"I pretty much have my hands full with the program the way it is now, but we're looking at making some changes anyway. Next fall we may add a fourth night just for high school students and/or adults who are in need of help," Cullers said.

Cullers is still looking for individuals who would be willing to volunteer and encourages anyone interested to contact her at 539-6736.

"I DON'T MIND CRYING BECAUSE I FEEL I'M HAPPY."
MARCUS ALLEN, ANNOUNCING HIS RETIREMENT THURSDAY

Allen bids farewell to NFL, hello to TV

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A weeping Marcus Allen said he knew it was time to retire when he realized he could no longer make great plays — and was in danger of becoming crippled if he tried.

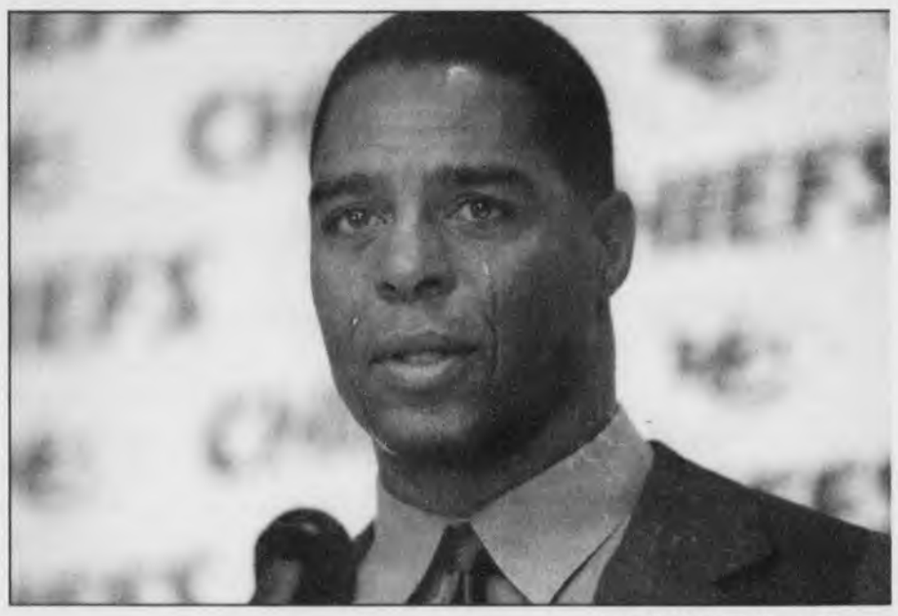
Stopping several times to wipe away tears, one of the most honored running backs in NFL history announced Thursday he was ending his 16-year career and joining CBS as a football analyst.

"I played with love and courage and tenacity. That's all I wanted to do," said the 38-year-old Allen, a former league and Super Bowl MVP, who appeared in more games (222), rushed for more touchdowns (123) and caught more passes (587) than any other running back in NFL annals. His total of 12,243 rushing yards is No. 6 all-time.

"I don't mind crying because I feel I'm happy," he said after somebody passed him a handkerchief.

Allen, the first running back in NFL history to rush for more than 10,000 yards and catch passes for more than 5,000, told Kansas City Chiefs coach Marty Schottenheimer just last week that he would play another season.

"I did tell Marty I was returning," Allen said. "But the one constant I've had since I came into this league was I could visualize and see plays unfolding, and be a part of that. And frankly, as hard as I tried to create that, the vision wasn't as strong as it needed to be."



▶ What do we think?
The Collegian editorial board thanks Marcus Allen for all he's done for sports.
See Page 4.

Blessed with great cutting ability and uncanny peripheral vision, Allen had a unique wide-screen view of the field as every play unfolded.

He rarely took a direct hit, allowing him to survive for 16 years at a position where few men last longer than eight. But the fear of serious injury was one more reason he quit.

"I clearly thought about that," he said. "One thing I always envisioned was to walk away. It evokes images of Dick Butkus and Joe Namath, who can barely walk. Yes, they're great players. But can they really enjoy their lives like they'd like to? That's something I thought

Fee hike given nod at Salina

▶ K-STATE-SALINA HAS 1ST INCREASE SINCE '91.

BRENNA TALLEY
Kansas State Collegian

K-State-Salina is boosting student fees next fiscal year for the first time since the college opened in 1991.

"We will be expanding activities to include more student life on campus as we grow more traditional. To do this, costs must go up," said Matt Wagner, senior in airway science and student body president.

The increase, a total of $1.25 per credit hour, will cost $15 for every full-time student and hits the Student Activities Center even harder.

Students previously paid $1.40 in privilege fees that have been saved to provide for a renovation of the student union.

A 25-cent increase of that fee will help maintain the new services.

"We'll be bringing it up to date. There will be computers, a big screen TV and a conference room added, and the SGA office will be moving there," Wagner said.

In addition, by hiring a manager, the Student Activities Center will be more accessible, increasing the hours of operation. The center will be open from 8 a.m. to 11 p.m.

Although the current Student Activities Center is on an indefinite tear-down list, newer facilities are necessary.

"If it's not a brand-new building — it's on a tear down list — but that's nowhere in the future that we can see," Wagner said.

Also included in the fee increase is a $1 attachment for student-life improvements.

Part of that money will go to pay University Counseling Services, who will provide a counselor once a week so the Salina campus will have the opportunity to use the Lafene services available to main-campus students.

"Seventy-five percent of their time will be spent with specific programs like pilots under stress and general finals stress. The other 25 percent will be spent on campus," Wagner said.

Two areas of the college will maintain their current funding.

"Tony's Pizza and the city of Salina contribute to our Rec center, and our fee is only 50 cents. The Education Opportunity Fund, which provides tutors, expressed no need for more money this year," Wagner said.

Next year's higher fees have met some initial opposition, but Wagner said people should understand the necessity.

"Students will be able to see the benefit of their money," Wagner said.

Athletes honored for work in classroom; coaches recognized for academic support

SUN DEE MILLS
Kansas State Collegian

Nearly 150 scholarly athletes were recognized Thursday for their academic achievements at the second-annual Academic Banquet at the Ramada Inn.

After a buffet dinner, Kevin Page, director of academic affairs, spoke to the athletes. Page said that last year, 118 athletes were eligible to attend the banquet. Eligible athletes had to post at least a 3.0 grade point average.

This year, 146 athletes were eligible to attend, and 137 appeared at the banquet. Page said those not in attendance were missing because of other academic obligations.

"This speaks highly of the hard work you've all done so far," Page said of the increase in numbers.

Of the 10 varsity sports represented, 29 coaches also were in attendance.

"When it comes to coaches and academics at K-State, coaches have always put academics first," Page said. "They've always been very supportive of the academic learning center system, and we very much appreciate their support."

The purpose of the banquet was to recognize the achievements all student-athletes made in the classroom, Page said. As an award, each athlete received a denim shirt with a Powercat on the pocket.

"We wanted to bring student-athletes together from all sports away from sports to recognize you for what you are. Excellent students," Page said.

Five athletes were chosen to receive the Academic Achiever award. Barb Allen, academic counselor, said these student-athletes were chosen by the academic counseling staff.

"The academic counseling staff just gets together and sits down to come up with the people that deserve it," Allen said.

Teen-smoking battle taken into heart of tobacco country

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CARROLLTON, Ky. — In the heart of tobacco country, President Clinton pledged on Thursday to do right by the families that grow tobacco as he pressed his battle against teenage smoking. Tobacco companies scoffed at his promise.

Clinton's visit, one day after cigarette makers said unprecedented anti-tobacco legislation was dead, was designed to increase pressure on the industry not to fight Congress as it moves to curb teen smoking and compensate states for smoking-related health-care costs.

Clinton and lawmakers said they would act with or without Big Tobacco's cooperation.

Ag senator pledges more communication after being elected Student Senate chair

Student Senate officers were elected Thursday evening for the 1998-99 Senate year.

After numerous debates on the side of each candidate, Agriculture Sen. Gabe Eckert was elected Senate chair, Agriculture Sen. Jake Worcester was elected Senate vice chair, Arts and Sciences Sen. Phil Stein was elected Faculty Senate representative and Arts and Sciences Sen. Amie Kershner was elected intern coordinator.

During his debate for Senate chair, Eckert said he wanted every senator to have a good experience.

"I want to make sure that each one us in here has the experience that they are looking for," he said.

Eckert also said he wanted to have good interpersonal relationships with every senator.

"Before the end of the year, I want to sit down and talk with each person that is here and find out what motivated you to run," he said. "I want to provide solid leadership for everyone."

Senators expressed concern about having Senate meet the Thursday before finals.

Eckert said there would be no Senate meeting before finals.

Arts and Sciences Sen. Barbara Dethloff said she expects mutual faith, respect, commitment and dedication from the Senate chair. She said Eckert shows all these qualities.

"He will do his best in everything he does — may not enjoy it, but he'll still do it," she said. "He will not only go to the mat for people, he'll go the extra mile."

Worcester said he wanted to help new senators learn about Senate.

"I want to focus on helping them understand exactly what goes on in Student Senate," he said.

"I want to work with new senators with parliamentary procedure, committee structure and how the interworkings of Senate works.

"I want to make Student Senate the best that it can be."

Human Ecology Sen. Robin Cates said he thought Worcester will do a great job.

"He's enthusiastic. He can deal with each little piece and make it work for you," she said. "He's open-minded and wants to get to know everyone."

After being elected as Faculty Senate representative, Stein said he is extremely honored to have this position.

"I feel extremely honored to be able to express Student Senate's initiatives and ideas in front of the Faculty Senate and administration," he said.

Stein said he was looking forward to working with the faculty on the course information program and improving advising for K-State.

"I'm going to do all I can to help get the approval of Faculty Senate on these issues," he said. "I'm also looking forward to being able to continue to work with fall break and the academic honor code."

Distinctive porcelain doll among prizes in Human Ecology Council fund-raiser

A K-State doll soon will find a new owner.

The Human Ecology College Council will be raffling off the doll to raise money for its student leadership fund, which supports student-led activities in the college.

The money raised will go toward paying for expenses that its student governing association money will not cover.

Virginia Moxley, associate professor of human ecology and adviser to the college council, said the doll was one of a kind.

"The doll was given to us by a K-State alumna," she said. "She makes porcelain dolls and gave us one as a fund raiser."

The doll stands 18- to 20-inches high and is decorated in K-State clothing, complete with Powercats and purple shoes.

"She is a really beautiful doll," Moxley said. "She's an original."

Lindsey Elliot, junior in family studies and human services and publicity chairman of the council, said tickets are available and will be sold at various times.

"We are charging $3 per ticket or $5 for two tickets," she said. "The doll itself is worth more than $525. It's a really good deal."

The doll is on display in Hoffman Lounge in Justin Hall. It be be raffled off on May 3, and the winner does not need to be present to win.

Couple accused of taking newborn baby plead innocent to kidnapping charges

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A Missouri couple accused of abducting a newborn girl from her mother's hospital room have pleaded innocent to federal kidnapping charges.

Buddy Hall, 30, and Amanda Tull, 18, entered the pleas during their arraignment Thursday before U.S. District Judge Gerald Rushfelt. A hearing on pre-trial motions was scheduled for May 11, U.S. Attorney Jackie Williams said.

Hall and Tull were arrested Jan. 29, about 23 hours after infant Carlie Shockey disappeared from a bassinet in her mother's room at the University of Kansas Medical Center in Kansas City, Kan.

The couple had Carlie with them as they walked into a home in High Ridge, Mo., where FBI agents — tipped by a relative of one of the suspects — were waiting for them.

The infant was in good health after a trip that, according to prosecutors, took the couple from Kansas City, Kan., to their hometown of Sheridan, Mo., to High Ridge south of St. Louis.

Hall and Tull are both charged with one count of kidnapping. If convicted, they could face life in prison without the possibility of parole.

After the suspects were returned to Kansas, Rushfelt ordered mental examinations for both. He ruled March 26 that both were competent to stand trial.

Idaho teen-ager takes classmates hostage but exchanges them for snacks, cigarettes

POCATELLO, Idaho — A 14-year-old boy briefly kept some of his classmates hostage at a school for troubled youngsters Thursday, then surrendered after trading his guns for snacks and cigarettes.

After initially keeping about a dozen students inside The Alternate School, Mitchell Gushwa permitted them to leave. Police said four students remained with Gushwa voluntarily until he gave up nearly five hours later.

"The release of hostages was never an issue of the negotiations. They wanted food, alcohol and tobacco," police Lt. Garry Pritchett said.

About 15 to 20 students and staff members were meeting around 8:30 a.m. when Gushwa pulled a gun.

"He was loading his gun while the principal talked and when he cocked it, the teachers looked over and then he pulled it out," student Jesse Hernandez told the Idaho State Journal. "He said a bunch of swear words and put the gun in my face."

All the staff members and about half the students escaped.

Gushwa gave up one gun in exchange for cigarettes. He surrendered not long after trading his second gun for pizza, chips and soda.

Gushwa was held pending a psychological evaluation. Capt. Kirk Nelson said some of the other students also might face criminal charges.

New Panhellenic officer emphasizes academics

LINDSEY FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

For Kathy Hill, serving as vice president of Panhellenic Council is just one of the many opportunities the K-State greek system has given to her.

"My office deals with the academic aspect of Panhellenic, which is the sole purpose of why we're here at school," said Hill, junior in life science and pre-occupational therapy and member of Delta Delta Delta sorority. "I train the new member educators and give them insight in how to help new members, so they do not flunk out of school."

Hill was elected vice president at the Panhellenic meeting on March 30. The council voted on new officers for the 1998-99 school year.

Hill said the vice president needs to be someone organized and open-minded to changes, but also who knows when rules need to be enforced.

"I want to get the greek system's (grade point average) on an uphill, because in past years it has shown some signs of decline, but nothing to be alarmed about," she said.

Hill said she wants the first Greek 101, a meeting for all greek chapters, to focus on scholarship and time management for the incoming students.

"Next year, I want to get to know the other houses better and know what they would like to get out of Panhellenic," she said. "I would like to see the greek system stay strong and support each other."

Working to maintain a strong greek system is important, said Jenny Scarpa, one of the two elected rush coordinators, who leads the recruitment for the entire greek community.

"There are so many different aspects of rush," said Scarpa, junior in speech pathology and member of Pi Beta Phi sorority.

Scarpa said the rush coordinators have to be personable and knowledgeable about the greek system.

"I relate well to others and am easy going. I don't like to put things on the back burner. I like to get things done," she said.

Juggling her busy school schedule and Panhellenic participation, Scarpa said she considered the option of rush coordinator because it takes place during the summer and will not interfere with her schoolwork. Scarpa said she could devote her efforts toward a successful rush.

"It would be nice to get more incoming freshman and people here at K-State to rush," she said.

This year, Scarpa wants a philanthropy to become part of rush. She would like to schedule the 500 women rushing to do a community-service project for Manhattan one night during rush.

"It's important to show our value of community service to incoming freshman, and what a better way to do that than to incorporate it in rush," she said. "We have a really great group of rush counselors that are so representative of the greek system and a positive light."

The Panhellenic officers are not only a governing board, but representatives for all the sororities on campus. Kellie McClellan, elected public relations director, said the image of the greek system is not always great, and anything she can do to better the image is worth her time.

McClellan, sophomore in public relations and member of Kappa Alpha Theta sorority, said she wants to promote more neighborly relations for fraternities and sororitiesin residential areas through newsletters, dinners and house tours.

IFC president-elect Keenan says communication crucial

LINDSEY FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

The votes were said to be close, but after considering each slated candidate, the K-State greek Interfraternity Council elected new officers for the 1998-1999 school year Monday night.

"I don't think we could've gone wrong tonight. We had excellent candidates slated for every position," said Barb Robel, adviser for Greek Affairs.

Cade Keenan, member of Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity and junior in industrial engineering, said as the elected IFC president for 1998-1999, he wants to increase communication.

"My main goal is to open up live communication between chapter presidents," Keenan said.

He said the IFC president is a coordinating officer for each of the different IFC offices. He plans to unite the voices of the IFC, so they can act as one greek community rather than individual voices.

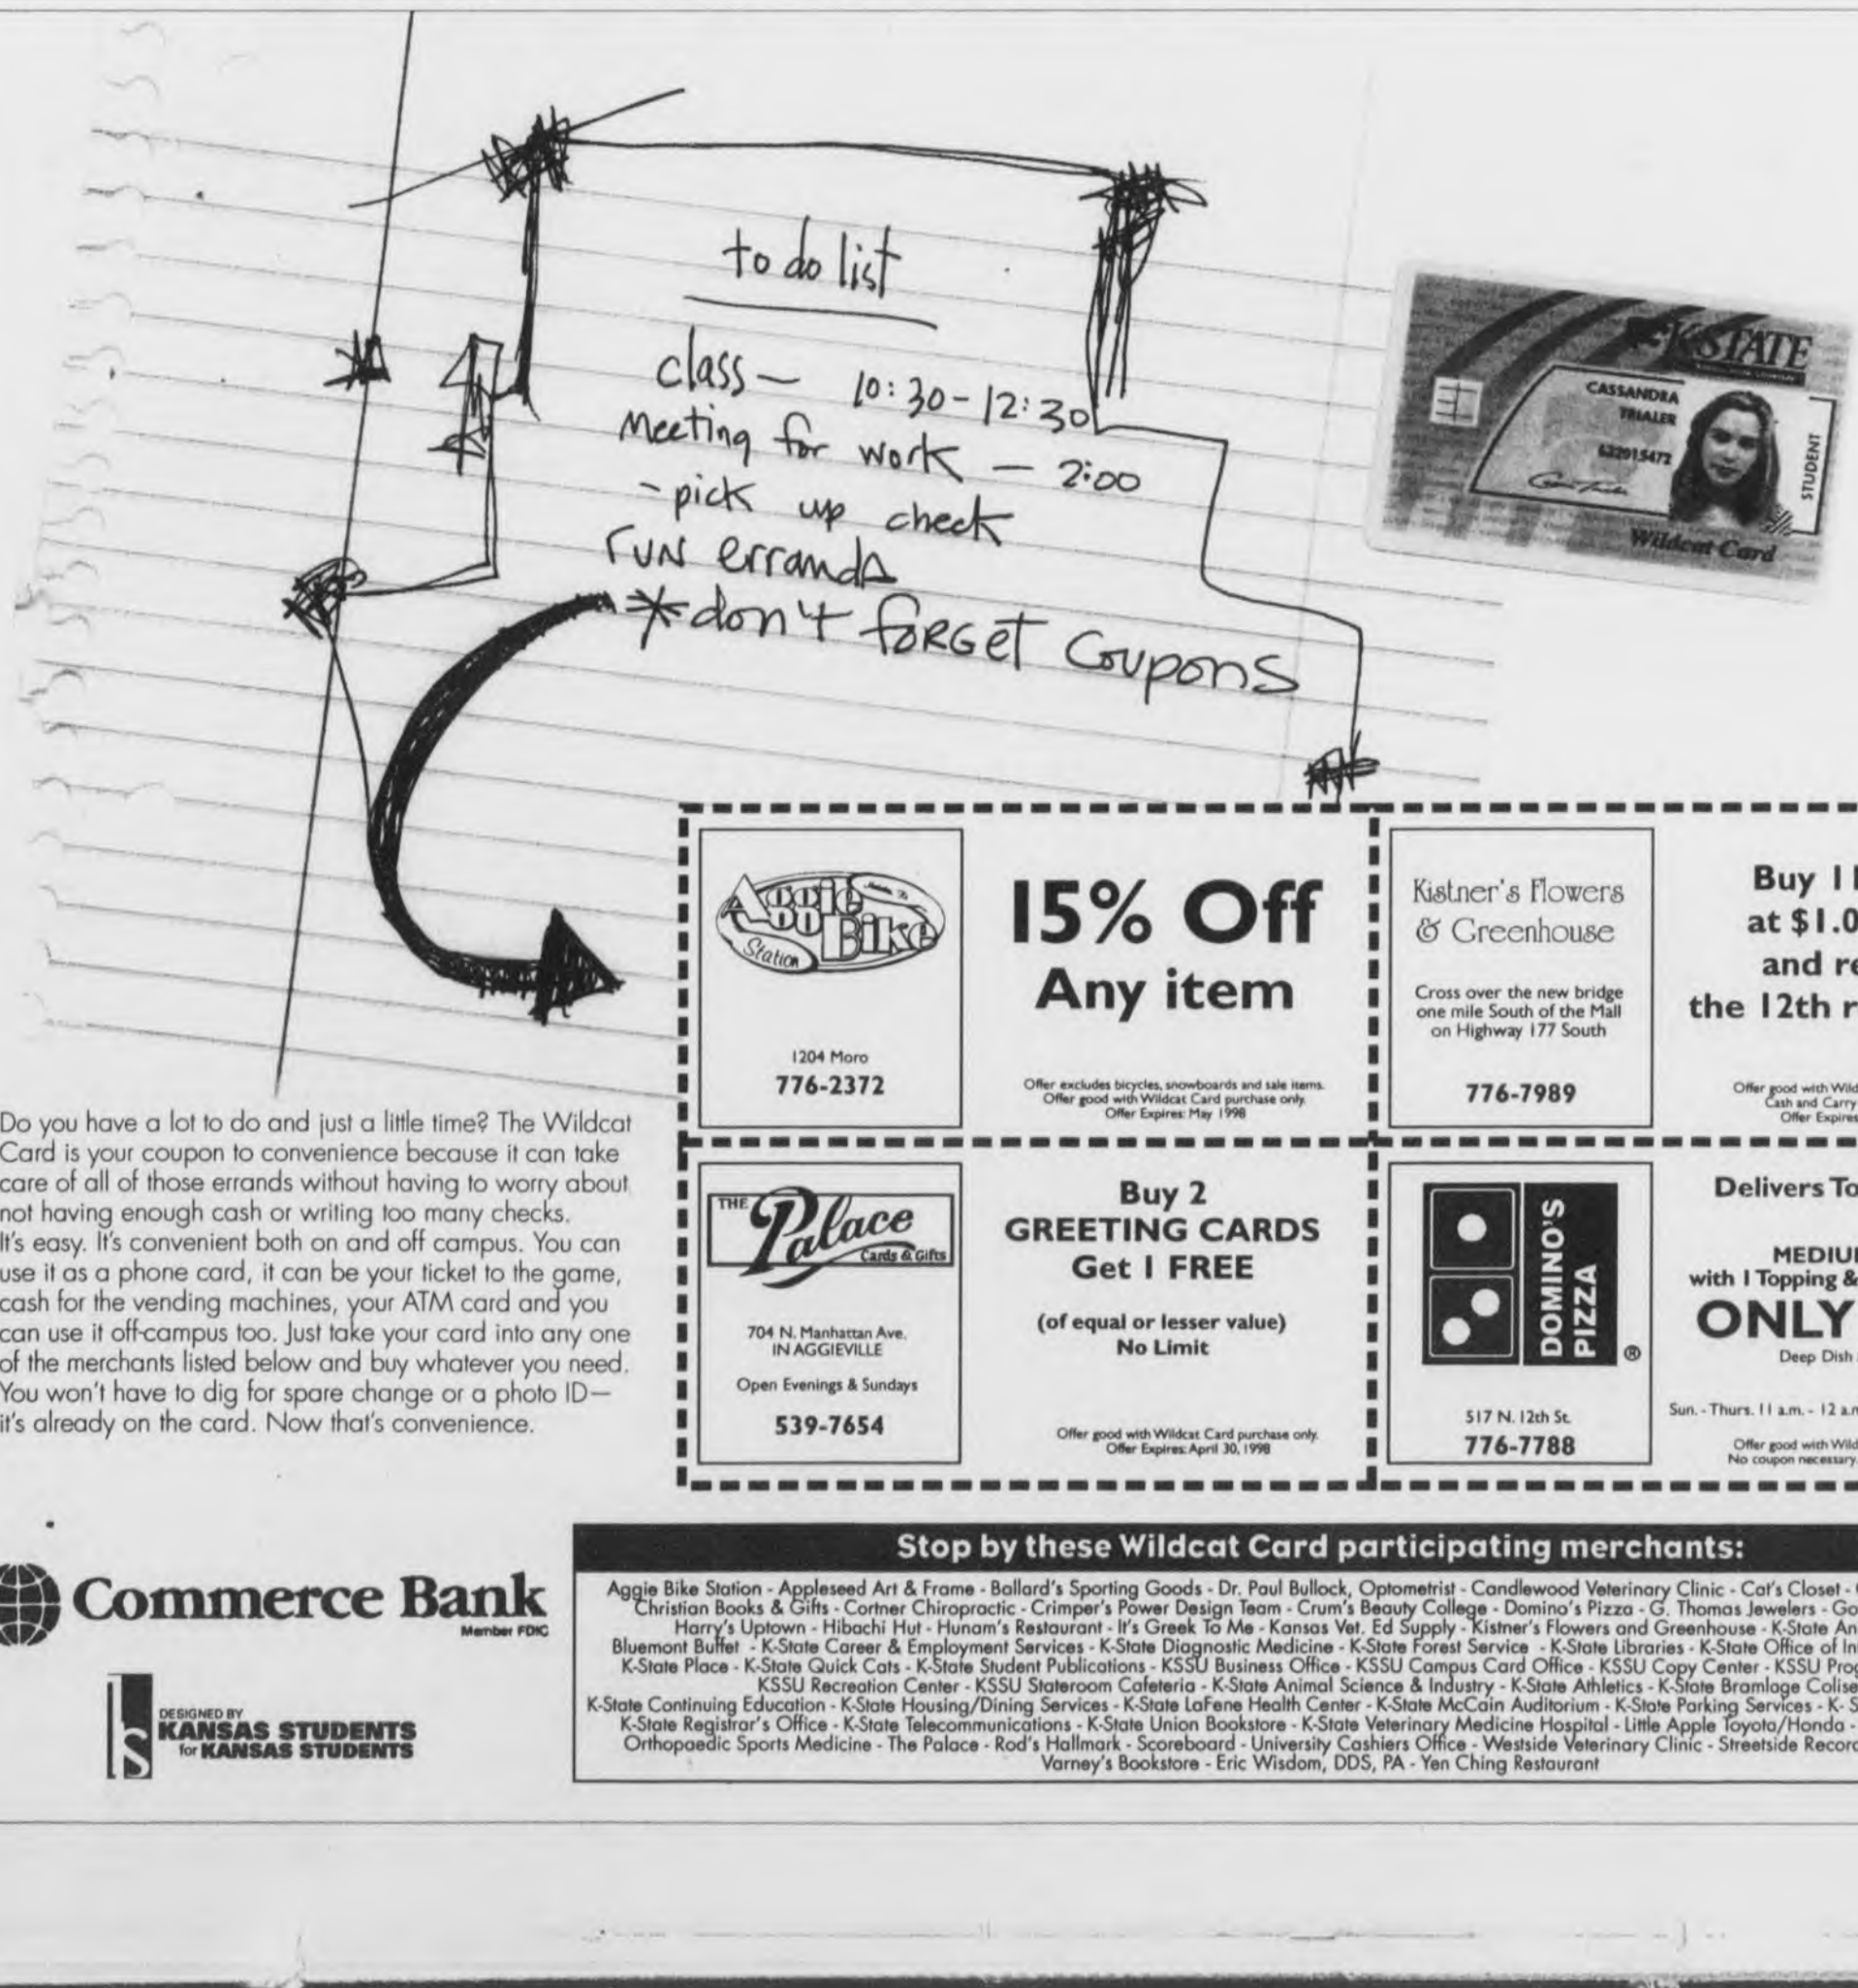
"There's kind of a mediating aspect of it," he said. "We need to mediate possible disputes between chapters, just to be a personal contact to each of the chapter presidents, to make them feel like they can come to the president with any concern they have."

Keenan said he wants to listen to ideas other than his own.

"They bring a tremendous amount of experience to their individual positions, and I have complete faith in them," he said.

One newly elected officer said he brings experience to his position. Last year, Matt Marron, elected IFC director of public relations for '98-'99, was president of Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity.

"I think I can use a lot of things I learned being president and incorporate that in as public relations director," Marron, senior in advertising, said.



Marron said he applied for the IFC office to help create a positive outlook on the greek system.

"What I'm planning on doing is trying to incorporate maybe some kind of advertisement, some kind of campaign to promote positive greek experience, maybe with K-State and possibly other universities combined," he said.

Marron said to help accomplish the goals while in office, the greek community needs to have more sound brotherhood between fraternities.

David Waters, previous IFC executive secretary, member of Phi Gamma Delta fraternity and junior in political science and modern languages, said the council had a difficult decision to make regarding the candidates slated for the offices.

"I'm very confident that this council will be able to easily represent the Interfraternity Council very well," Waters said.

On and off the field, he exemplified all that is right in professional sports, and yesterday the sports world took a great hit when one of its' finest stepped aside and retired after 16 years in the game he loved.

Hhe retired in a way only Marcus Allen could — like a champion.

He wasn't forced out of the game because of poor production. He wasn't released to open up time for a younger running back. In fact, chances are he would have been the starting running back for the Kansas City Chiefs, come the first week of the season.

Marcus Allen went out at the top of his game.

Marcus Allen's productivity showed none of his 38 years of age, and he left no one doubting his heart or his ability.

And no one doubts he will be successful in his future endeavors, because Marcus Allen doesn't give up. Marcus Allen doesn't fail.

Before coming to Kansas City, Allen spent his last two years with the Los Angeles Raiders on the bench. Raiders management had a grudge against Allen, and stole two years from his football life. The man who would eventually score the most rushing touchdowns in the NFL history would ride the bench for two of his prime football years.

But in true Marcus Allen style, he didn't complain. He was down, but never out.

When his chance at free-agency came along, the Chiefs rescued Allen and Allen rescued the Chiefs. And it was a great relationship for the past five years.

Allen brought his champion heart onto the field and into the community. Chiefs fans and children had the role model the city desperately needed, and Allen finally was given the appreciation long overdue to him.

But the influence of Marcus Allen will not die in the Kansas City area, or in the football community.

Marcus Allen showed it is OK for athletes to be role models. In fact, he showed how an athlete can thrive in that role.

He is a modern-day testimonial to the benefits of hard work, resilience and humility.

So while his days on the field have come to an end, everyone should be thankful for the time we had to enjoy his work.

It's not a sad day, because the lessons and inspiration Allen has showed on and off the field will shine through for generations to come.

CLONING'S A SHIP AND IT'S DROWNING SLOWLY

One of science's newest endeavors just another way of playing God

It is time to play a game of lifeboat. But this time it is for real. Let's decide who is important and eliminate those who aren't. And we'll do it with society's consent.

Selective human cloning. It requires the overcoming of a few more scientific barriers, but human cloning could soon meet reality. It is then we find ourselves attempting to play God.

Does actually cloning a human seem like science fiction? So were novels about people traveling to the moon. It was impossible. Just a dream. Scoffers existed when Orville and Wilbur flew at Kitty Hawk also. But science succeeded and we now reap the benefits.

VIEWPOINT

SAM SACKETT

Sam is a sophomore in public relations. You can send e-mail to Sam at sjs8645@ksu.edu

I am not afraid of science or technological advances. Halting melioration is not my intention. I believe that most scientists have good intentions for understanding our universe and the way it works. But purge science of ethical limitations, and we will surely damn ourselves.

Cloning men and women is more than science. It is making us God. We decide who has value. We decide what characteristics we want in our society. And we manufacture them.

I believe human life is too valuable. The individual person is far too precious for society to decide what traits are important and what traits aren't.

Who is to say that a person who never succeeded intellectually, who never made the sports teams as a youth and who never achieved fame is of less value than Thomas Jefferson or Hank Aaron. Could it be Albert Einstein was as valuable as his mother? Maybe society's unknown are equally as important to our survival as history's celebrated.

You have heard of human cloning. But you might not have heard about the headless mice and tadpoles created by two universities. The University of Texas and the University of Bath (England) have found the gene in the genetic code that is responsible for forming the head. Micro surgery, and voila! Headless mice are born. The technology is new and results are often unpredictable. But it has been done and advancements are occurring. Headless mice and tadpoles. What about humans?

Consider what would happen if these two scientific breakthroughs are combined. Cloning a human minus the brain or head, and then we have a "living" organ donor with exact body parts for you, the prototype. Perfect for such things as heart transplants.

It might seem beneficial to humanity. But tampering and manipulating human life to save human life is wrong. We are people, not plants or animals.

Scientific obstacles do exist, but I want you to critically understand what could happen — warily watching for dangers. So read with reserve, but not total.

Try to imagine. See it as having been done. Then make-believe that it is being done.

You are a middle-aged American citizen. You've been married for a few years, and you have a spouse. You both have clones. But the clones are just kept alive. They don't actually think or reason. They look exactly like you, only they are not you. They don't have rights, because they aren't human. They are really just breathing organ banks for your body.

Transplants — not a problem. If your kidney begins to fail, you have it replaced with one from a clone.

You don't just have one clone, but multiple clones. They are kept alive and then disregarded when too many vital parts have been used up. Stop feeding it. Put it to sleep. Do whatever is done with unusable conscience-free clones. You've got more.

But this isn't all. You are actually a clone yourself. So is your spouse. But you both have individual consciences. Therefore, you are human and have rights. You were selected by society based on your prototype's physical strengths, beauty and intellectual capabilities.

But this is not unusual. Most of your friends are clones too.

People with trepidation about cloning humans are a dying breed.

So here you are. Perfect. Able to live indefinitely. And all because your original's body was perfectly suitable for you.

Man became God and chose what attributes you should have. The "nuisances" to society no longer exist.

You live in a Utopia where society makes value judgments about what type of people are useful, and what type aren't. You are simply a result of science.

Don't be fooled by the disguise of science. Let's lock the door on human cloning before it's too late.

Will shows narrow-minded view of higher education in America

Just who does George Will think he's writing for in his Last Word column in the April 13 Newsweek?

The column, aptly titled "Disorder in the Schools," criticizes institutions of higher learning and, it follows, high schools for ill preparing children for the rigors of higher education. He recounts how college students are disrespectful to professors, how they show up late to class and leave early, and on and on. The criticism of the actual institutions is based on lax standards that are supposedly responsible for a less select student body.

Surely some of this criticism is just. As anyone on the K-State campus can hopefully appreciate, there are times we students can sometimes feel like we are at more of a "Vo-Tech of the Prairie" as opposed to a "Harvard of the Prairie."

VIEWPOINT

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

Russell is a fifth-year senior in architectural engineering. You can send e-mail to Russell at rmf@ksu.edu

But where Will, like Newsweek does on many occasions, fails his readers is by having such a narrow view of what higher education in the United States really means. The superficiality of his argument becomes apparent in one of his final grand statements: "For whatever reasons, too many high schools serving minorities are failing to equip their most promising students for the most demanding institutions at the next level."

That's it? That's what passes for insight in journalistic circles nowadays? Perhaps Will has been spending too much time making TV appearances.

It's as if Will has simply recounted in his mind that "I went to a private boarding school that got me into (insert Ivy League school here), why should it be so hard for the rest of America?"

His narrow statements ignore larger issues. Of course, no writer could be expected to solve the crisis of higher education in one column, but to make such bold statements with little or no explanation is not helping anyone.

Will continues Newsweek's tradition of wholesale ignorance of higher education. When the vaunted magazine produces a story on higher education, it undoubtedly focuses on a few exclusive East or West Coast universities that are the exception, not the rule, and represent a distinct minority of college students. Any story on the cost of education — especially one that focuses on $30,000 a year tuition costs at Ivy League schools — generally ignores the fact the majority of Americans are getting affordable educations (i.e. K-State) and doing quite fine.

Also in the April 13 issue, a small tidbit in the Periscope section focuses on a Harvard professor who just took a position as house master at one of the university's student residences. The point to the story — if you can believe this — was that the professor is a lesbian and will be living with a woman. If you can't see the significance and national relevance of this very important story (why didn't it make the cover?), then ... I don't know how to finish this sentence.

In the article, we're reminded the house has "weekly high teas with china" and an "annual spring performance of Tchaikovsky's 1812 Overture" as if to assure us that it's perhaps the finest student residence at Harvard, a traditional encampment of the children of the well-to-do. And then — as if to let us know having two lesbians running the house is no big deal in order to reassure readers of their progressive and intelligent tolerance — the article states officials said her sexual orientation "wasn't a consideration" and students think it's "no big deal."

What a relief. This is ground-breaking journalism, folks.

I realize K-State is not Harvard and the fact my tuition is only 4 percent of Harvard's hits home every time I try to use a campus resource and can't find what I need. However, this is a vibrant campus that contributes to international scholarship and produces some outstanding students. Just because my parents don't golf with Newsweek publisher Katharine Graham at Martha's Vineyard doesn't mean my experience in higher education is any less valid. Who really cares that two (gulp) lesbians are running a residence hall at Harvard as opposed to Oklahoma State?

Will and Newsweek represent the very finest level of East Coast snobbery. One can easily imagine how a story must get proposed at Newsweek:

Buffy: Hey, Mr. Huffington, remember me? I played tennis with your daughter in Monaco last year. Yeah, Buffy. Well, anyway, two lesbians are moving into the Fortune 500 House and a couple people are kind of upset. Do you want to write a story?

Mr. Huffington: That sounds fabulous. I'm glad you're connected to an elite East Coast establishment of media celebrities and their children a la "Six Degrees of Separation" and that we can depend on your important fact-gathering efforts.

I just know news from Harvard will be especially relevant to Iowa.

Buffy: See you at the Club tonight for a few drinks.

Mr. Huffington: Don't tell your parents.

Okay, so you get the point. It seems I've railed against the popular press a couple times this year in columns. It doesn't have to be Newsweek, since most magazines (Time, U.S. News and World Report) are equally at fault. Perhaps it could be owed to the high level of condescension that exists in most popular media. Or the media's ineffectual reporting of education issues (just ask any high school teacher what they think of any local paper).

I don't expect national magazines to devote pages to covering Midwest higher education, but I suppose one expects a prominent magazine not to wear its bias on its sleeve.

Fairbanks failed to research, include helpful hints for tenants

Editor,

I wanted to comment on David Fairbanks' Wednesday article, "Lord of the Flies." Do you suppose he merely forgot in his column of "helpful hints" to include the fact that the county courthouse on Poyntz Avenue has a staff member who advises landlords and tenants of their legal rights or could he just not be bothered to ferret out such an obvious source of information?

Did he know that you can obtain a summary of the Landlords and Tenants Act from them? Without this kind of basic research, Fairbanks, your column has all the import and usefulness of two people gossiping over coffee.

Fairbanks talks about tenants' privacy, for example, but fails to mention that there are legal guidelines that govern a landlord's right to enter your apartment and a tenant's right to privacy. How exactly does Fairbanks propose a tenant prevent a landlord from coming into their apartment if talking to him had no effect? He refered to all sorts of abuses by landlords, but never about the recourse one has or about tenants' responsibilities.

Fairbanks could at least have mentioned that the Office of Student Activities and Services has Consumer and Tenants Affairs assistance or that the University Attorney's office keeps a file on problem landlords. Or used to.

Maybe this is just a rumor, but at least it's true that you can call the city codes inspector to have the apartment inspected.

Here's a piece of information that I discovered when I was researching these issues: there is nothing, other than the consumer's savvy, preventing landlords from renting substandard apartments. There is, however, a list of condemned buildings available to the public. I believe it is maintained at the county offices as well.

Additionally, small claims and other court activities are considered public information. You could get your little pencil out and document how many times a prospective landlord's name shows up. If you really wanted to be helpful, you could publish these facts.

Maybe this information is out of date. I could look it up, but shouldn't YOU have done that? What kind of "journalism" is it that values personal anecdotal drivel over basic factual information?

Why is it, for example, that after paying astronomical KPL gas service bills you still don't know that you can call KPL and ask them for the average monthly utility bill for any apartment in Manhattan? Fairbanks could have advised tenants to do a damage checklist before they moved in, in the presence of the landlord, signed by all parties, so that they don't get charged, as he did, for preexisting damages.

I'm dismayed that it never occurred to Fairbanks to inform his readers that they are entitled to an itemized list of damages whenever a landlord deducts from their deposit. This is the type of concrete information with which prospective students need to arm themselves against the slumlords that pervade the housing market in Manhattan.

The only truly useful thing you said in your article was advising students to get promises made by their landlords in writing.

"As a tenant, you are entitled to many unquestionable rights. Exercise them." Just don't ask Fairbanks what they are, because he didn't bother to find out. Perhaps a little homework would be an effective substitute for the "trial and error" method that led to your dog-paddling session in your living room. Or perhaps you should just buy water wings.

Senator says Urick's justification for ticket increase misleading

Editor,

In the April 3 article "How Much Are You Willing To Pay?", Max Urick, the director of intercollegiate athletics, provided false and misleading information concerning the athletic privilege fee cut by Student Senate.

Urick claimed that $147,215 had been cut from the athletic privilege fee by Student Senate. However this is incomplete information. Of the $600,989 in the 1997-98 athletic privilege fee, the K-State Bands received 14 percent, or $84,139. Student Senate separated this line item from the athletic privilege fee for the 1998-99 academic year. Thus only $63,076 was actually cut from the athletic privilege fee.

Additionally, not all of that money was cut from the football program. It received only 7 percent, or $42,069, of the original fee. Student Senate determined this cut was appropriate due to the recent success of the football program.

The K-State football program no longer suffers from poor attendance caused by one-win seasons. K-State football in the 1990s has developed a national reputation and no longer needs to be subsidized by student privilege fees. For this reason, the football line item was eliminated from next year's athletic privilege fee.

Urick's figure of $147,215 was more than three times the actual cut to the football program's budget. This deliberate act to deceive the student body of K-State was simply an attempt by Urick to justify the $4 per game increase of football tickets.

Lawmaker hopes for delay in Citicorp/Travelers merger

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A House Banking Committee Democrat says the proposed merger between Citicorp and Travelers Group should be delayed until allegations that Citibank laundered drug money for the jailed brother of the former Mexican president are fully investigated.

"No merger should go forward unless Citibank is completely exonerated of these charges," Rep. Maxine Waters of California, the Congressional Black Caucus chairwoman, said Thursday in declaring her opposition to the deal announced this week.

Joseph Coyne, a spokesman for the Federal Reserve, which must approve the merger, said Citicorp and Travelers Group had not yet submitted a merger application. He declined further comment except to say that "we take into account anything involving the companies."

The Justice Department has been investigating since mid-1996 to see whether U.S. laws were violated when Raul Salinas transferred millions of dollars from Mexico through New York to Switzerland. The New York bank was a conduit for the transferred funds.

> "NO MERGER SHOULD GO FORWARD UNLESS CITIBANK IS COMPLETLY EXONERATED OF THESE CHARGES."
> MAXINE WATERS
> Black Caucus chairwoman

The Mexican and Swiss governments also are investigating.

Waters said Swiss investigators have credible evidence that Salinas, whose younger brother, Carlos, is the former president, acted as the middleman for Colombian and Mexican drug lords by laundering tens of millions of dollars through Citibank's private banking system.

Citicorp, the nation's second-largest bank, and Travelers Groups, an insurance and brokerage giant, this week proposed a deal valued at $82 billion that would give millions of consumers across the globe a single place to take care of all of their banking and investment needs.

Waters, in a letter Thursday to Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan, asked that the merger application be put aside until the Justice Department investigation is completed and "there is a finding regarding Citicorp's guilt or innocence in connection with money laundering."

Waters also sent letters to President Clinton and Attorney General Janet Reno, and has asked House Banking Committee Chairman Rep. Jim Leach, R-Iowa, to schedule hearings.

Waters, the senior Democrat on the Banking panel's government oversight and investigations subcommittee, said she also would introduce legislation to block the review of merger applications involving institutions that have been accused or found guilty of money laundering.

"We cannot continue to direct all of our war on drugs to our street dealers," she told reporters. "We have to go after drug dealing and money laundering in high places."

In addition to the money-laundering allegations, Waters said she also opposes the Citicorp/Travelers Group merger because it could reduce access to financial services by the poor.

Cleanup begins after Southern storm; 38 found dead

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — Rescue crews went from one wrecked house to another and a helicopter with a sensor to detect body heat was flown in to help find the dead and alive Thursday after a tornado killed at least 32 people in Alabama.

Encouraged by finding a 9-month-old baby alive, Sheriff Jim Woodward said rescuers would continue looking for victims through the night until they were confident everyone was accounted for.

The tornado struck with winds up to 250 mph while many people in this Bible Belt area were at regular Wednesday night church services. Violent weather from the same storm system also killed five people in Georgia and one in Mississippi, for 38 deaths altogether.

In Alabama, nearly all of the dead were in small communities west of Birmingham, where some houses looked as if they had exploded. More than 40 people remained hospitalized, several of them in critical condition.

Gov. Fob James said 150 homes were destroyed and 300 heavily damaged. President Clinton declared parts of Alabama and Georgia disaster areas, clearing the way for federal aid.

"It's quite amazing, and I hope you all say a prayer for those folks tonight, and join with them in spirit as they rebuild," the president said during a visit to a high school in Carrollton, Ky.

Vice President Al Gore told the governor he would visit today.

In the town of Rock Creek, the tornado hurled one victim into a tree and flung others across streets and yards. The house where Allison Brown and his wife, Hazel, spent most of their 89 years looked as if it had been blown up. They were found dead, together, two blocks away in a ditch.

"I hope it was quick," said Lynn Pappas, their daughter. "I hope they weren't afraid."

The twister ripped open trailer homes as well as houses with traditional foundations. Deb Helms and her two sons, Colby, 8, and Carson, 4, were killed while they hid in the basement of their Rock Creek home.

"It's supposed to be the safest place," said Leon Hyche, a relative. "The whole wall collapsed on them."

Rescue crews searched the devastaed houses and brought out tracking dogs to sniff out anyone dead or alive. The sheriff said a helicopter with a heat sensor was being flown in.

There was one joyous discovery Thursday, he said, when a 9-month-old baby missing throughout the night was found alive. The sheriff was unsure if the parents had survived.

In northern Mississippi, a 16-year-old boy was killed when a storm shattered the mobile home he was in. His sister and another girl had fled the home a short time earlier.

The storm system roared into Georgia early Thursday, with high winds and heavy rain and hail. Two people died in the Dunwoody area northeast of Atlanta, one when a tree fell on a house. Two hundred miles to the southeast, one death was reported at Fort Stewart, Ga. — that of a soldier working in the administration building. A woman and a 13-year-old girl were killed in a mobile home community just south of the base.

Throughout the particularly hard-hit Birmingham area, wooden homes were left in splinters, and brick houses were reduced to foundation rubble. Overturned cars and household furniture littered streets and yards. Fallen trees and power lines blocked roads.

The center of Rock Creek, the Rock Creek Church of God, was converted into a trauma center in the first hours after the tornado hit. The injured rested on pews as a cool breeze blew through the broken windows.

By morning, with the air crisp and skies sunny, diesel trucks from the power company rumbled along cluttered roads and chain saws buzzed as cleanup workers cleared streets. The pungent smell of fallen and freshly cut pine and oak trees filled the air.

The roadside debris included empty intravenous bottles and latex gloves of paramedics, evidence of the frantic rescue work of the long night.

Gary McGowan lost his home but counted himself among the blessed. As word of the approaching tornado spread, he ran from Calvary Baptist Church to his trailer, only to find that his wife and 3-year-old daughter had gone to her parents' home nearby. He ran inside, and they all sought shelter in a central hall.

"I laid over my wife and baby, and God laid over me," he said.

All-America guard announces entry into upcoming NBA draft

TUCSON, Ariz. — All-American sophomore guard Mike Bibby moved toward millionaire status Thursday, announcing he's leaving the University of Arizona to make himself available for the NBA draft.

"It's just been a dream of mine since I was a little boy, and now that that chance is here, I don't want to let it pass me up," Bibby said at a campus news conference.

Some NBA officials said they believe the 19-year-old Bibby will be the first point guard taken in the draft, and have few doubts he has the skills and talent to be a success in the league.

"Mike is very ready to play in the NBA," said Wildcats coach Lute Olson, who was told by Bibby of his decision to turn pro last weekend.

Bibby, son of former NBA guard Henry Bibby, becomes the second Arizona player in the 1990s to leave early for the NBA. Center Brian Williams declared himself eligible for the draft in 1991 after his junior year.

Bibby showed his leadership capabilities quickly in college, directing Arizona to the national championship as a freshman.

As a sophomore, he was a consensus first-team All-America and took the Wildcats to the NCAA Tournament's regional finals before losing to Utah 86-61.

Bibby was named the Pacific-10 player of the year this season and averaged 17.2 points and 5.7 assists — up from his freshman averages of 15.5 points and 5.2 assists.

"I think he's ready," Atlanta Hawks scout Royce Youree said. "He's going to have an adjustment period, like everyone else. People don't realize how strong you have to be at that level. He has all the tools that you need, though."

Los Angeles Lakers general manager Jerry West said Bibby's style of play reminds him of Oscar Robertson, a fellow Hall of Famer who was a contemporary of West's in the NBA.

"He plays an old-fashioned game, which I think a lot of people like," West said. "He's a prospect, that's for sure."

Rob Babcock, player personnel director for the Minnesota Timberwolves, said Bibby has great potential.

"He understands the game. He's got great court vision. He understands how to play the point guard position and he can shoot it," he said. "His skill level is very, very high."

Couples shoots 70 after 18 holes to take 1st-round lead at Masters

AUGUSTA, Ga. — The two par 3s on Augusta National's front side rarely make a TV appearance; they live in the shadows of their much more famous cousins, the 12th and 16th holes on the back nine.

But tournament records, and Thursday's Masters action, show these high, dry front-side holes are the most difficult par 3s on the course and are among the most difficult in golf.

Two-time Masters champion Tom Watson said he considers the four-hole stretch beginning with the par-4 3rd hole and including the par-3 4th and 6th holes the key to winning at Augusta.

"That's the unsung turn," Watson said. "Those are difficult holes."

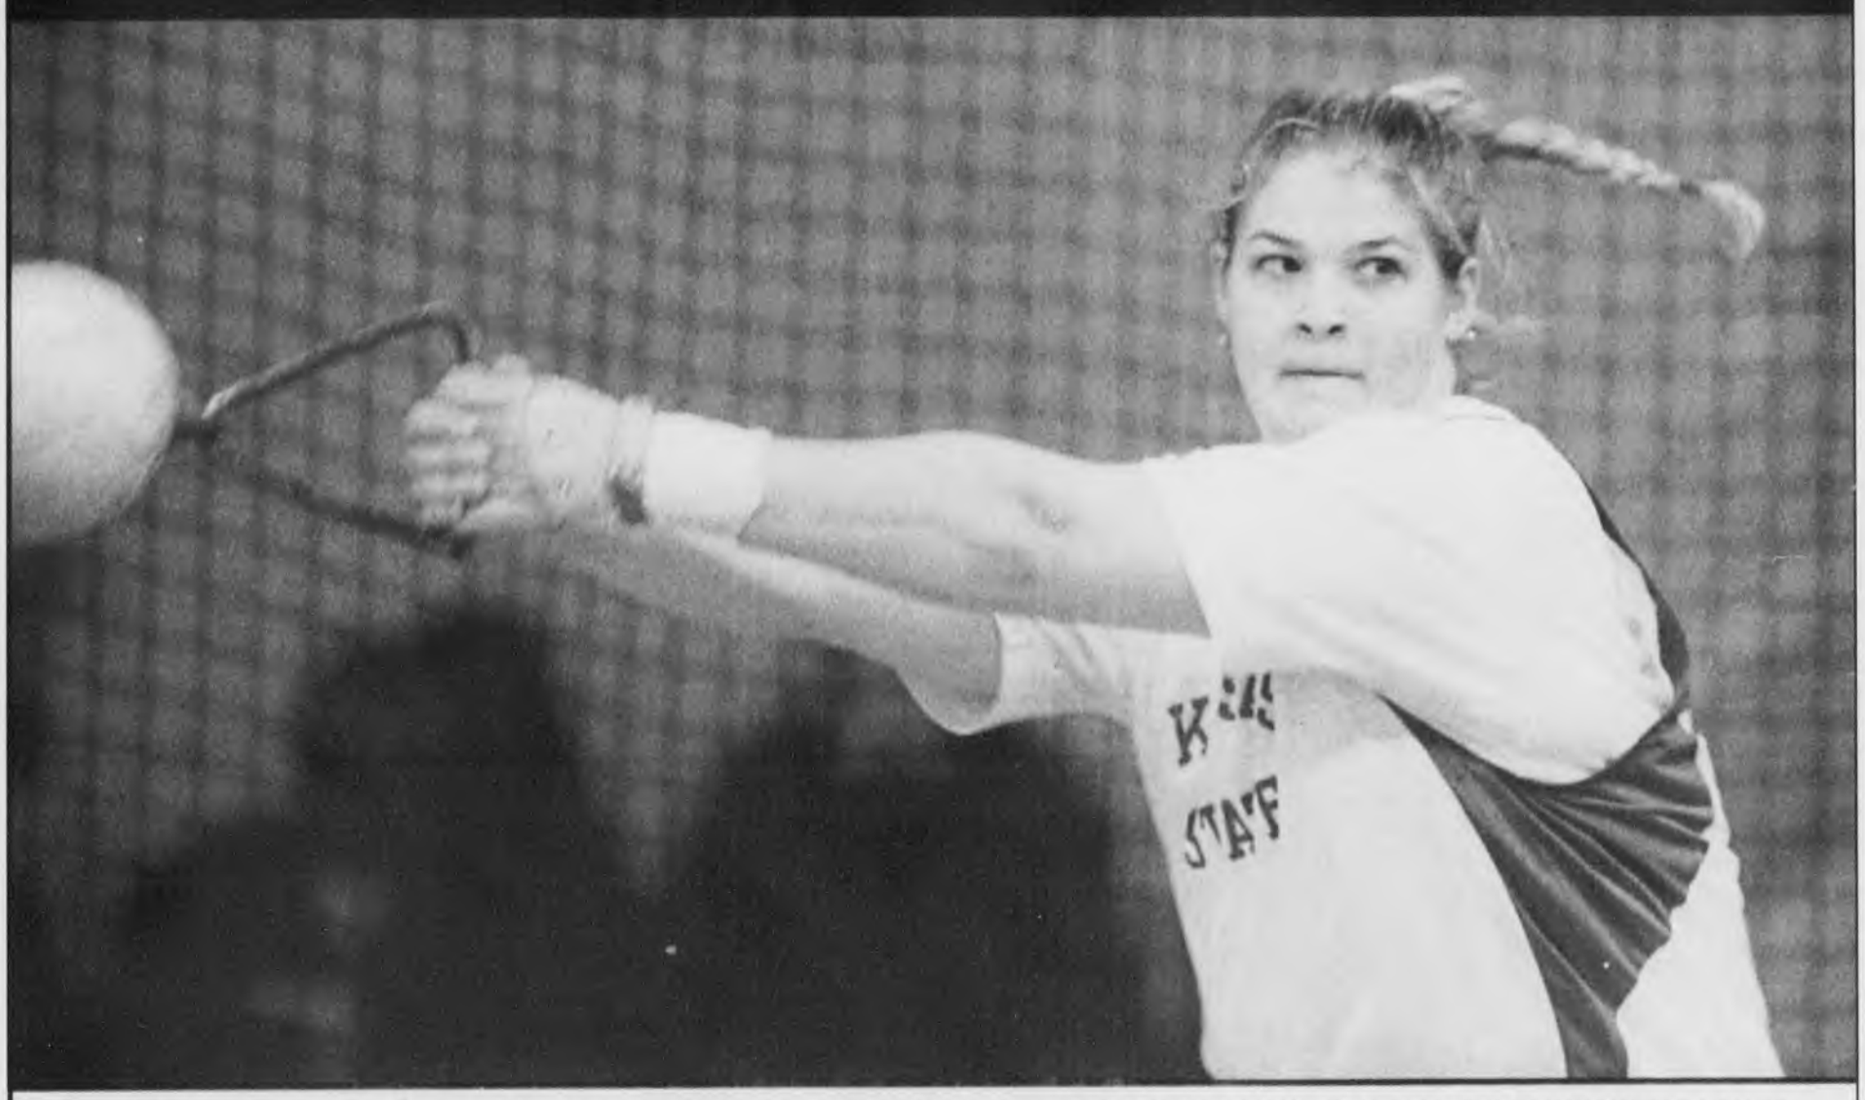
With swirling winds topping 30 mph, just hanging on through this early stretch was a struggle, even for the best players.

First-round leader Fred Couples started out with three consecutive birdies, then bogeyed Nos. 4 and 6, three-putting both from 30 and 40 feet, respectively. He later bogeyed No. 12 before finishing with a round of 3-under 69. Jeff Maggert also strung together three opening birdies, only to slip with bogeys on Nos. 4 and 6. He later double-bogeyed the dangerous 12th and ended the day even par.

Defending champion Tiger Woods had one of the day's best rounds, a 71, but bogeyed Nos. 4 and 12.

The 4th, "Flowering Crab," is the first par 3 at Augusta, a 205-yarder from an elevated tee to a shallow but steeply sloped green. A yawning bunker in front guards the right half of the green — the bunker that grabbed Greg Norman's tee shot during his disastrous final round in the 1996 Masters. Another trap protects the left side.

The hole has been aced only once in Masters competition, by Jeff Sluman in 1992. Last year it was rated the toughest hole on the course, playing to a stroke average of 3.348. It was also the only hole at Augusta National on the PGA Tour's list of the 50 most difficult tournament holes last year, ranking 33rd. Over the history of the Masters, it ranks second in difficulty to Augusta's long par-4 10th.



"There's a very shallow landing area, and you have a lot of carry," Watson said. "Judging the wind on No. 4 is one of the most difficult judgments on the golf course."

Things were little easier for those who hit the green. Ex-Masters champ Larry Mize's approach putt looked good going up the hill but kept curling away from the hole until he had a 20-footer left for par, which he made. Michael Bradley barely tapped his approach putt from above the hole and watched it trickle 20 feet. He missed coming back for a bogey.

The 6th hole, "Juniper," was the third-toughest hole on the golf course last year, playing to a 3.265 average. It has been aced three times, most recently in 1972.

One of the great features of Augusta is that no two par-3s play in the same direction, so players must deal with tee shots involving four different wind conditions. The 6th was playing with the wind Thursday.

Hammer time

RENETTA SEILER ATTEMPTS A WEIGHT THROW DURING AN INDOOR TRACK MEET IN AHEARN FIELD HOUSE. SEILER IS NOW THIRD ON THE ALL-TIME LIST OF COLLEGIATE HAMMER THROWERS AND RANKED SECOND IN THE NATION.

K-State athlete hammers her way into NCAA record books

The athlete's hand grips the handle of a hammer. A steel ball, which had been resting — waiting for someone to give it a ride — is put into motion. The ball, connected to a cord, slowly begins to circle above the athlete's head like a storm brewing. The athlete starts to spin with the ball, picking up speed as she goes. Then, the inevitable thunder crashes — the grunt — as the hammer is released into the air.

For many who have seen the hammer throw, the one thing that sticks in their mind about the event is the grunt, often followed by some sort of yell. This leads to the question, "Is it necessary?"

"Most people are starting to yell, because you get into it so much more," K-State hammer thrower Renetta Seiler said. "You're so pumped up, then you scream because you put everything you have into that throw."

Seiler said she doesn't grunt on every throw, but when she does, it means something.

"My farthest throws, I have grunted on them," she said. "It's like I pulled on them a little bit harder — they were real. I think a natural grunt is better than an artificial one."

There is no arguing with a woman who bench presses more than 200 pounds and safe squats 578 pounds. Besides, the grunt seems to have worked well enough. Seiler is now third on the NCAA's list of the best collegiate hammer throwers of all time and ranked second in the nation this season.

> "Once you pick it up, it's addictive."
> Renetta Seiler
> track star

Seiler's toss of 207-6 at the University of Texas-El Paso Invitational on March 28 put her ahead of South Carolina's Lisa Misipeka, who defeated her in this season's NCAA Indoor Championships weight throw, on the all-time-best list. Amy Palmer of Brigham Young and Dawn Ellerbe of South Carolina are ahead of Seiler on the list.

The hammer, in its third year as an NCAA-sanctioned event for women, is a rapidly expanding event, K-State assistant track coach Randy Cole said.

"Not too long ago, a throw of 190 feet was great," Cole said. "That's still a good throw, but now many women are throwing over 200 feet."

Although Seiler has thrown more than 200 feet in her first two meets this season, she said she considers herself to be a baby in the event. She did not throw hammer in high school, and only has been throwing for 2 1/2 years.

"I think my sophomore year is when coach (Cliff Rovelto) realized that I would be pretty good in hammer," she said. "My first meet out I threw over 180 feet, and I had some warmups over 200 feet. By the end of the year I hit 204."

This season, Seiler said she has set her goals high.

"My goal is to throw over 200 feet every week," she said. "By the time nationals come around, I want to be over 200 on every throw."

Seiler said one of the things that got her hooked to the hammer is the distance it flies.

"When I first tried hammer, it was so much fun. Once you pick it up, it's addictive.

"One thing that's so addictive about it is that it goes far," she said. "It's awesome to be able to let it go, then turn around and watch it fly."

Track squad to face KU, Wichita in KT Woodman Classic in Wichita

The K-State track team will try to help promote track and field this Saturday at the KT Woodman Classic in Wichita by flying past Wichita State and Kansas.

K-State assistant track coach Randy Cole said the KT Woodman Classic was designed to help shed a new light on track and field, which has had a decline in support in recent years.

"It's part of the U.S. Collegiate Track and Field Series, where there are meets with three to five teams," Cole said. "The meets are nice, condensed three-hour meets to try to promote track and field."

One event that should be competitive at the KT Woodman Classic is women's pole vault, which is in its first year as an NCAA-sanctioned event.

K-State vaulter Erin Anderson and Candace Mason and Andrea Branson of Kansas are each NCAA provisional qualifiers, and are the top three in the Big 12 Conference. Anderson's personal record is 11-5 1/4, and Branson's is 11-7 3/4. Mason's is 12-9 1/2.

Anderson, who has never defeated Mason in the vault, said her goal is to clear 12 feet.

"I want to get over 12 feet because that should get into nationals," she said.

Anderson started vaulting in the summer 1997 when K-State coach Cliff Rovelto approached her with the idea. She said she is happy that she was introduced to the event.

"It's a daredevil kind of thing," Anderson said. "As long as it's going well, it's fun. I haven't been hurt yet."

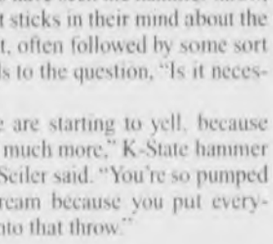
Although Anderson began vaulting almost a year ago, she did not vault in the fall, and just picked up the pole after winter break.

"I started off trying to go more than 7 feet, so I've come a long way," she said.

Another relatively new event, women's hammer, which is in its third year as an NCAA event, will feature two of the nation's best throwers — K-State's Renetta Seiler and Wichita State's Katie Panek.

Seiler is second in the nation among collegiate athletes with a throw of 207-6. Panek is fifth nationally with a toss of 200-9 and is one of six collegiate athletes to throw farther than 200 feet.

Cole said the men's events should be highlighted by the 800-meter run.



K-State's Istvan Nagy and Scott Galas could be the favorites in the event. Nagy is ranked second in the Big 12 in the 800.

"I think he's on the verge of busting some big performances," Cole said of Nagy.

I-70 road signs should boast K-State athletic prowess to intimidate visitors

VIEWPOINT

SUN DEE MILLS

Sun Dee is a senior in electronic journalism. You can send e-mail to Sun Dee at sundee@ksu.edu

As I drive home to Kansas City, Kan., which, according to my parents, isn't nearly enough lately, I have to pass that annoying sign at the West Lawrence exit of Intersate 70, the one that reads, "Home of the 1988 NCAA Basketball Champions." Or something like that.

And I have to snicker.

After all, it does say, "1988."

Approaching exit 313 for Manhattan and Council Grove, signs praising K-State's livestock judging team and the debate team greet those who drive past.

Now, before the angry masses fire up their computers to burn me, please understand something. I'm not at all saying those signs should be removed.

Before any of us were even thought of, this university was an agricultural college. The college produces some of the most successful graduates from this university.

The speech department has maintained a consistent level of excellence for a number of years. To win a national championship in debate repeatedly is one more example of what a well-rounded school K-State is.

But we're forgetting something.

What about the champions of the 1998 Fiesta Bowl? Why don't they have a place somewhere on that sign?

Perhaps they've gotten enough props. It's supposedly old news now. There are two impressive items on the sign already that happened in this decade, so we're already ahead of our foes down I-70. But think about this for a moment.

Think about those East Coast people who think the only Wildcats worth talking about are the ones living at Kentucky or Northwestern. I was in several of the East Coast states during spring break and believe it or not, those people still exist.

Imagine there's a group of college students from somewhere out there on a cross country road trip who pass the sign and say, "Oh, I didn't know those Wildcats were from Kansas. Cool."

So let's look at it as an educational thing.

Plus, pretend the few teams — OK, maybe this just applies to KU — that arrive in Manhattan for a game by bus see the sign as they ride into town.

Will it be a little intimidating to see in big white letters how successful the day's opponent was last season? Could it possibly give the Cats a small edge? One could only hope.

Rather than just spouting off about how much I think the sign should be out there, I decided to do a little background research. There's good news on all fronts. Mark Taussig, a university landscape architect who works with signage, was the man who could discuss this issue.

Taussig reassured me that yes, the signage had been ordered, but it was coming from the Kansas Department of Transportation. (Taussig said because KU is on the turnpike, the school works with the Kansas Turnpike Authority on these issues. The KTA is a smaller, more flexible organization.) Taussig said he met with the head of KDOT on Tuesday and inquired about the sign.

"They said they were working on it, but they've been working on it for a couple of months now," Taussig said. He said once it goes up, there will be not one, not two, but three recognition signs for K-State at exits 303 and 313. Take that, you Jayhawks!

Taussig told me the livestock judging sign will be updated, because the team won last November, and the debate sign will remain as well. The Fiesta Bowl sign will be posted in addition to the other two.

So now the question is, when will that sign appear? Taussig said he hoped it would be up by graduation. Hey KDOT, the Cats won in January. It's April now. Time is an issue here.

Why the impatience? Well, maybe it's in the air, because spring football practice just started. Maybe I just need to go to a baseball game to get into the swing of things (sorry, bad pun) for the summer.

Either way, I'm not kidding when I say time is crucial now. Note to KDOT: Let's see that sign soon, before you guys have to change it to read "Home of the 1999 NCAA Football National Champions."

Teammates, opponents remember Allen's football accomplishments about."

Opponents readily recognized his skill.

"He's like Jim Brown, always getting five or six yards a pop,' Atlanta Falcons linebacker Cornelius Bennett said.

"What makes him dangerous is his cutback ability."

"He is 'The Man,'" former Denver safety Dennis Smith said. "You can see it in his eyes. He does the intimidating."

"Marcus Allen is the embodiment of the consummate professional football player," said Chiefs' president Carl Peterson, who signed Allen as an unrestricted free agent in 1993 after he had languished for his last two years with the Raiders.

"Everything that Marcus did, both on and off the field, was put forth in preparation for giving a winning performance each week."

He had special praise for the Chiefs and Schottenheimer, who signed him at 33 hoping to get at least a couple of years out of him.

"Marty, thanks for the opportunity," Allen said, fighting back tears. "To be 33 years old ... to be written off by some, and be given the opportunity just to show what you are and what you do, what I felt like I was born to do, and that was to play football.

"Football has basically been my life. I feel like I'm the luckiest guy alive. You get to live what you want to do. The records, of course, I'm proud of, but my God, it's the people, that's what it's really about."

Allen should be able to step easily into broadcasting.

He said the records will fall, but it's the memories that will live on.

"The moments in the training room, the moments at halftime, the moments on the sideline during games. Those are the moments I will take with me forever," he said.

"I'm sure my records will be surpassed. It's the people who matter."

Athletes cited for academic achievements center tutor coordinator, presented the awards to Jennifer Omohundro from women's golf, Rachel Jaeger from women's crew, Brandon Peck from baseball, Tamel Sisney from track and Gavin Peries from football.

"These five student-athletes showed special dedication and perseverance in pursuing their academic achievements," Johnson said. "These students are people who are around the academic learning center all the time, taking advantage of the opportunities given to them by the athletic department."

The 3.0 GPA is the same criteria the Big 12 uses in determining the Commissioner's Honor Roll, Allen said.

Max Urick, athletics director, said he was glad to see the numbers increase from last year and hoped to see the trend continue.

"This banquet will always be a priority with me," Urick said. "I understand how difficult it is to be a Division I athlete, with all the responsibilities, and I'm impressed with all of you."

Women's and men's basketball, baseball, volleyball, tennis, women's and men's golf, football, track and women's crew each had at least five athletes from their rosters who received an award. The track team had the highest number of athletes in attendance, a total of 39.

Clinton's tobacco battle takes root in new theater future," Clinton said at a rally at Carroll County High School. He urged families reared on the profits of burley leaf, a type of tobacco, to look at such evidence.

"To me, no company's bottom line is important compared to America's bottom line. America's bottom line should be your life, your future, your health."

He said farmers would not be left to pay the price.

"Tobacco farmers have not done anything wrong," Clinton said. "If we succeed in reducing teen smoking, then sooner or later we will reduce the overall demand for tobacco. ... Can we do that and still do right by the families who grow tobacco, by the warehouses, by the communities? I think the answer to that is 'yes.'"

Not likely, the tobacco companies said.

"Any grower who falls for Bill Clinton's line is making a really terrible mistake," said J. Phil Carlton, the industry's top settlement negotiator in Washington, D.C.

He said there is no way to protect farmers if companies are driven out of business or overseas.

While Clinton spoke, Brown & Williamson Tobacco Co. Chairman Nicholas Brookes joined more than 400 employees to protest that the pending crackdown would devastate the industry and the local economy.

"I can't find another job that pays what Brown & Williamson pays," said Vicki Shockley, a single mother with a 15-year-old daughter, as workers paraded with signs saying "Don't Tax Us Out of Our Jobs."

Last June, the big companies signed a deal with state attorneys general to settle 40 state lawsuits by paying $368 billion and curbing marketing in return for significant legal protections.

That deal, RJR Nabisco chief Steven Goldstone said Wednesday, is now dead because Congress and Clinton have toughened the provisions enough to kill the industry. The pending bill would raise the industry's penalties and fines to half a trillion dollars — without the legal protections — so Goldstone pledged to work to kill it.

"We agreed to change the way we do business, not to go out of business," said full-page newspaper ads by the top five tobacco companies Thursday.

Members of Congress called the tobacco companies' move arrogant.

"It doesn't change what we're doing. We're going to get a bill that cuts down on teen-age smoking," said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who authored the bill.

But tobacco supports half of Kentucky's family farms, and many here worry that Clinton's effort to extract fat payments and fines from tobacco companies ultimately will hit them, too.

"It's very easy to talk about punishing the big tobacco companies for their evil doings down the way, but what we want to show you is that this gets back to the people," said Bill Sprague, president of the Kentucky Farm Bureau and a fifth-generation farmer who grows 3,000 acres of tobacco.

McCain's bill would provide $28.5 billion to buy out thousands of tobacco farmers and help others retain their livelihoods.

Clinton assured the community he would not sign legislation that lacks such protection.

But given the high profits of tobacco farming, he admitted farmers won't make as much money if they switch to another crop.

Clinton visited the Kentuckiana Warehouse and listened intently as small farmers, public health advocates, a minister and a high school student pleaded for help in weathering changes to the tobacco industry.

Speaker stresses importance of teaching to diverse needs

SHELLY SLATIER
Kansas State Collegian

Patrick J. Terenzini, the 13th speaker in the Chester E. Peters series, said unitary education is not the answer to serious learning.

Terenzini, a professor and interim director of the Center for the Study of Higher Education at Pennsylvania State University, indentified many problems in the undergraduate education system. He said universities focus on teaching rather than learning, and they must realize that all students do not learn the same way.

"We need a new environment that will accommodate the differences in how students learn and at the rate they learn," Terenzini said.

He said students are expected to learn what is pitched at them in class, some students understand the material and some don't.

"That determines who moves ahead," Terenzini said. "Learning is the goal, not how fast students learn."

He said learning in colleges today is instructor-centered and students learn more through experience.

"Current methods of teaching are from teacher to the student, the knower to the learner," Terenzini said. "Learning is more than an exercise in class, it is being in a real life situation."

Amy McCoy, sophomore in psychology, said learning is more than students being taught at.

"Learning is continuous and it goes on all the time," she said. "It's not just during class, and colleges need to emphasize school involvement."

Terenzini said learning is not inducible, and students do not have to learn a certain amount of base information in a subject to perform a job task.

"Students' extracurricular activities have just about as much impact as the classroom because they are learning by experience," he said. "That is why internships, studying abroad and college work study programs provide good experience."

Terenzini said he suggests universities should move away from a class sequence-structured education.

"Learning should not be additive and cumulative and stacked on what was learned before," he said. "We need to concentrate on shaping and guiding the learning environment for students rather than to create it."

Mike Perl, director of student services at the College of Education, said this would allow for a variety of different professors to sit down with a student and develop a specific curriculum to fit how they learn and what they learn.

"My job as a professor would be to help students get the information they need to accomplish that," he said.

Terenzini said in order for the system to change organizational leaders must pay attention to how individuals learn.

"I'm not so naive to say that change will happen quickly," he said.

Terenzini spoke to more than 100 people Thursday morning at Forum Hall. The lecture was videotaped. For a copy, contact John Steffen, associate professor of counseling and education psychology at 532-5946.

Scientists urge education of evolution

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Evolution should be taught in public schools as "the most important concept to modern biology," a panel of scientists said Thursday in response to efforts to keep the subject out of the classroom.

"There is no debate within the scientific community over whether evolution has occurred, and there is no evidence that evolution has not occurred," the National Academy of Sciences said in a guidebook intended for teachers, parents, school administrators and policy makers.

It says that understanding evolutionary change is essential to understanding vital processes, such as how bacteria become resistant to antibiotics.

Evolution still causes trouble for teachers and school officials more than 70 years after John Scopes was convicted of violating a Tennessee law against teaching it and more than a decade after the Supreme Court ruled that public schools cannot teach that God created the universe.

"Many students receive little or no exposure to the most important concept in modern biology," said the guidebook.

An indication the subject's sensitivity: The Arizona Board of Education kept the word "evolution" out of its 1996 science standards, although they specify that students learn "how organisms change over time in terms of biological adaptation and genetics." Scientists protested the omission, and a committee will study the question this year.

The North Carolina House passed a bill last year requiring that evolution be presented as theory, not fact. And a Christian publisher in Richardson, Texas, Jon Buell, says he's been getting plenty of orders for a biology textbook, "Of Pandas and People," presenting the view that the world is the way it is by design — a term that critics say code for creationism.

Moreover, a number of university scholars, including law professor Phillip E. Johnson of the University of California at Berkeley and biochemist Michael Behe of Lehigh University, have published books and articles challenging evolution. They suggest that life, from cells on up, is too complex to have evolved.

"Our contention is that there is reasonable evidence of intelligent design," said Raymond G. Bohlin, who holds a doctorate in molecular biology and heads the Probe Ministries, based in Richardson, Texas.

Without naming names, the panel says opponents of teaching evolution have quoted prominent scientists out of context to claim a consensus is lacking.

That helps get teachers and lawmakers off the hook.

"Just this year a parent asked me if I was teaching evolution as a theory or as a fact," said Elizabeth Carvellas, a biology teacher in Essex Junction, Vt. "I explained that I taught it as theory. That seemed to settle that problem."

Barry Raugust, a high school biology teacher in Wichita, said he focuses on genetics and change when talking about evolution. "Regardless of other explanations of how life began, you have to understand it to understand biology and make sense out of it," he said.

He avoids talking about human descent from earlier primate species.

"That's way over their heads," he said. "That's just setting yourself up for arguments, and that's counterproductive in my opinion. That might be a good thing for college or whatever, but at the high school level it's overkill."

KEEP UP THE GOOD WORK!

Three ways to beat the high cost of college.
1. The Montgomery GI Bill
2. Student loan repayment
3. Part-time income

The Army Reserve Alternate Training Program is a smart way to pay for college.
First, if you qualify, the Montgomery GI Bill can provide you with up to $7,124 for current college expenses or approved vo/tech training.
Second, if you have—or obtain—a qualified student loan not in default, you may get it paid off at the rate of 15% per year or $500, whichever is greater, up to a maximum of $10,000. Selected military skills can double that maximum.
Third, you can earn part-time money in college, and here's how it works: One summer you take Basic Training, and the next summer you receive skill training at an Army school. You'll earn over $1,500 for Basic and even more for skill training. Then you'll attend monthly meetings at an Army Reserve unit near your college, usually one weekend a month plus two weeks a year. You'll be paid over $107 a weekend to start. It's worth thinking about. Give us a call:

Behind-the-curtain tour offers new perspective on theater

STORIES BY AMY MILLER • PHOTOS BY JEFF COOPER

Saliva, sawdust and silk were part of a behind-the-curtain tour of the Department of Speech Communication, Theater and Dance last Thursday evening at Nichols Theatre and McCain Auditorium. About 15 people attended the tour, open to season ticket holders and members of the Greenroom Guild, which raises money for the K-State Theatre.

Tempest rehearsal

Rhythmic clapping and stomping beckoned to participants in the lobby to come into the theater and watch the cast of "The Tempest" rehearse.

"I want to see spitting consonants and vowels," said Charlotte Macfarland, associate professor of speech communication, theater and dance and director of "The Tempest," as she led the actors in vocal exercises.

Next the 17 cast members, standing in a circle onstage, each practiced a few lines from the play as Macfarland instructed them to stress the consonants in their words.

"I didn't see enough spit. I want to see spit flying out," she said.

McCain scene shop

The aroma of freshly cut wood and a layer of sawdust on the floor of McCain's scene shop testified to years of set construction.

David Centers, head of design for the department, explained some recent changes, such as the conversion to stock platforms with steel corners and locking devices for steel legs. The set platforms now require fewer legs and less bracing, and the steel lasts longer than wood.

"We can recycle and reuse pieces, and they can always be melted down to make more," he said. "More and more scene shops are moving in that direction."

Centers said he uses Styrofoam in many sets because it is cheap and light enough to be moved around easily. He said he tries to reuse materials or share them with other theater departments in the area.

"We try not to throw anything out," he said.

Centers, who has worked at K-State for five years, said many set designers study architecture or at some point wanted to be an architect, including himself.

"Unfortunately, I ran around the house singing all the time," he said with a laugh.

The set storage room, full of wall-to-wall shelves packed with doors, window frames, steps, light fixtures, gates, curtains and miscellaneous scenery components, recently has been cleaned up and reorganized so every piece is inventoried and is in its assigned location.

"This used to be called the KSU Dump," Centers said. "I could only get so far into the room. It's night and day compared to what we were dealing with before."

McCain costume shop

Dana Pinkston, costume designer and assistant professor of speech communication, theater and dance, said this is a busy time for McCain's costume shop, after completing 35 to 45 costumes for SpringDance '98 and getting ready for "The Tempest."

The shop produces about 300 costumes a year. About 30 to 40 of those are constructed entirely for the specific production, amounting to about 50 to 150 pieces including undergarments and accessories. The rest are rented or pulled and modified from the large stock of costumes the department has saved from other productions.

"We build everything to last 20 years," she said. The costumes are stored in the costume shop, in a large walk-in closet down the hall and, at one

Experience enhances theatrical magic

Learning about the different technical aspects that make up a K-State Theatre production doesn't diminish the show's magical effect, said Marci Maullar, associate professor of speech communication, theater and dance and managing director of K-State Theatre.

"It enhances it," she said. "People are amazed at what can be accomplished."

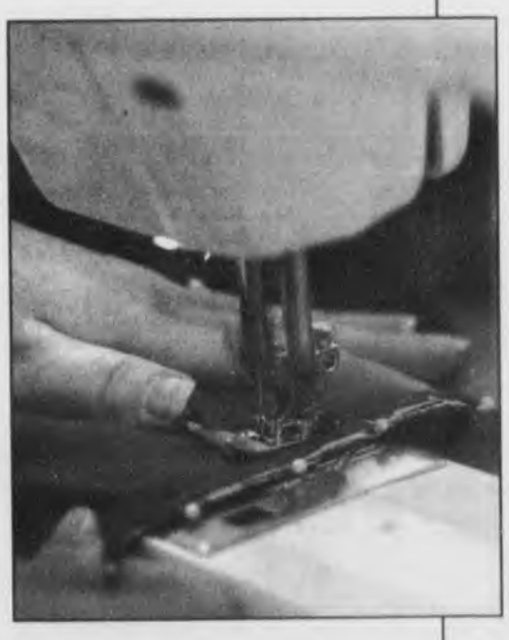
Maullar said season-ticket holders and members of the Greenroom Guild were invited to last Thursday's tour of Nichols Theatre and McCain Auditorium.

"The Greenroom Guild members are donors — people who donate to the theater program," she said.

The guild has no minimum donation requirement.

"It goes from $25 to $1,000," she said.

She said the tour was planned because so many people had expressed an interest to her in learning more about K-State Theatre.



The tour was the first of its kind, said Richard Hayter, president of the K-State Theatre Development Board. The one-year-old board helped organize the tour.

"We want to do more tours, maybe one per year," Hayter said.

The board, created to increase volunteer contributions and awareness of the K-State Theatre program, is composed of four to five members who meet a few times each semester.

Hayter said the board recently kicked off a sell-a-seat program for Nichols Theatre. A $150 donation buys a small brass plaque on a seat in the theater, which will be engraved with the donor's name.

The board, together with President Jon Wefald, will have a reception for donors following K-State Theatre's upcoming production of The Tempest.

'Lost In Space' loses on big screen

CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

In some cases, history never should be repeated.

"Lost in Space," the movie spinoff of the 1960s science-fiction TV show, opened last Friday. Because it seems to be a current fad in Hollywood to make movies based on old TV shows, audiences had to expect "Lost in Space" to be brought back sooner or later. Similarly, audiences should expect little or no plot from these types of movies.

Movie Review

"Lost In Space"
Shows at Seth Child Cinema at 7:05 and 9:45 p.m. this weekend.

2 stars
59-cent fodder

"Lost in Space" fits the stereotype.

The story, set 60 years in the future, revolves around the Robinson family, a clan who plans on making history by colonizing a distant planet called Alpha Prime. Dr. John Robinson, the patriarch of the family, predicts that if the colonization goes well, everyone on Earth will soon call it home — for Earth rapidly is becoming uninhabitable due to the deterioration of the ozone layer.

The Robinsons' ship, the Jupiter II, is piloted by Maj. Don West (Friends' Matt LeBlanc), a cocky war hero who tries in vain to win the affections of the oldest Robinson daughter. John Robinson, along with wife Maureen (Mimi Rogers) and children Judy (Heather Graham), Penny (Lacey Chabert) and Will (Jack Johnson) leaves Earth expecting to colonize Alpha Prime soon.

What follows is a cheesy and expensive romp through uncharted space. Special effects try to hide the lack of plot, and director Stephen Hopkins does well in hiding the blase storyline with explosions, spiderlike aliens, talking robots and fantastic chases through time.

Sandwiched between the beginning and the climax are scenes that are in no way related to one another. One would think that if these scenes were taken out, the movie would not be affected in any way. Likewise, the only members of the Robinson family who contribute anything to the trip through space are John and Will, the technological whiz-kid who saves the family on more than one occasion. If the characters of Maureen, Judy and Penny Robinson were eliminated from the story, little would change.

The only character who stands out was the devious Dr. Smith, portrayed by Gary Oldman. Oldman's Smith is undoubtedly the most believable person on a ship full of two-dimensional characters. Even LeBlanc's Maj. West has no depth. Once again, "Lost in Space" can be a movie LeBlanc adds to his extensive list of box-office failures.

I'm not implying that moviegoers should skip "Lost in Space" altogether. The climax provides a dazzling trip into an alternate universe where Maureen, Judy and Penny are dead, John must face his son at 30 years of age and Dr. Smith's now mutated beyond recognition due to a bite from one of the spiderlike aliens he encountered on the Jupiter II.

What ensues is a battle to change the past and save the future — with surprising results that will make you glad you sat through two hours of characters such as the whiny Penny Robinson and the pompous Maj. West.

Although you might want to see the film for the nostalgia, the special effects or the big name actors, be prepared for the fact that "Lost in Space" might very soon become "Lost in the Dollar Theaters."

'Seinfeld' finale taped, but ending shrouded in secrecy

LOS ANGELES — The "Seinfeld" gang labored until the wee hours of the morning Thursday on the sitcom's finale, but now comes the tough part: keeping the ending a secret.

Jerry Seinfeld and writer Larry David, who co-created the series, implored the studio audience to remain mum.

"Larry's speech to the audience was 'I have a dream. My dream is the TV audience that comes to the show on May 14 will not know any of the details,'" NBC executive Rick Ludwin said Thursday.

TV viewers will enjoy the hour-plus finale more if it's all a surprise to them, David told the crowd made up of family, friends and colleagues at CBS Studio Center. He wrote the final script.

The studio audience did not see the final scenes, which had been pre-filmed as part of the secrecy effort. Actors and others involved with the show have signed confidentiality agreements.

Filming on the last episode got under way at 9 p.m. Wednesday and ended about 2 a.m. Thursday. Then the celebration began.

"Out came the cigars, the champagne and the hors d'oeuvres. I left at 3:30, but they were still going strong," said Ludwin, who helped develop "Seinfeld" in the late 1980s.

NBC, anxious to keep the heart of its powerhouse Thursday night lineup, had offered Seinfeld an estimated $5 million per episode for next year. But he decided in December against another season.

NBC Entertainment President Warren Littlefield said he didn't sense any regrets.

"I look in his eyes, and I think he is sure. I think he feels very good about the decision," Littlefield said.

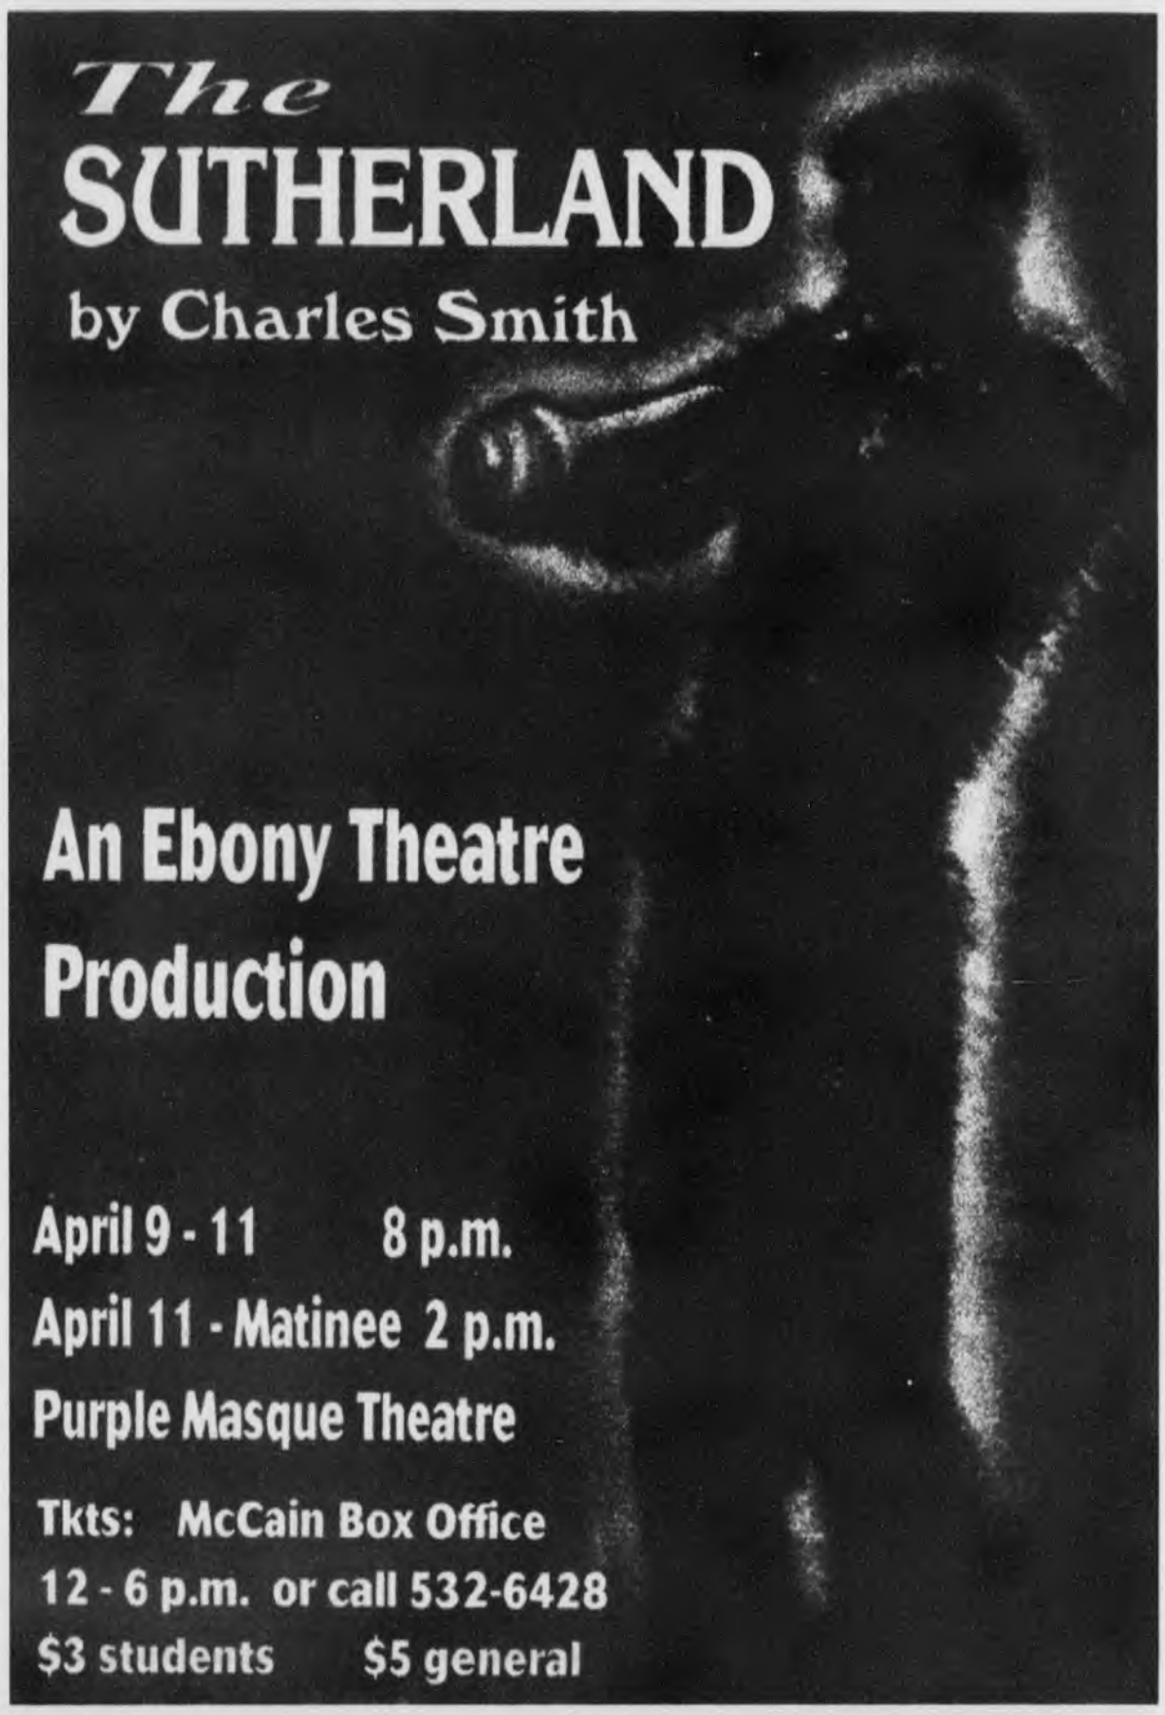
point, the overflow was boxed up and stacked in the showers in Nichols.

Pinkston takes an annual trip to New York City to buy fabric in the garment district. She held up a brown silk dress to be worn in "The Tempest" and said that in New York City the fabric costs $7 to $8 per yard, but in Manhattan it would be closer to $20 per yard. More than 30 yards of fabric were used to make the dress.

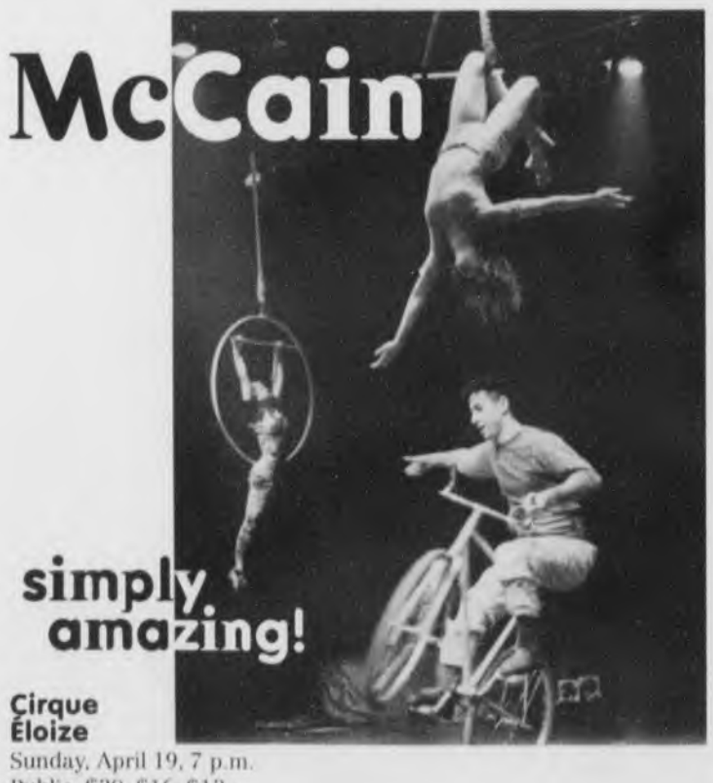
"I literally save hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of dollars by going every year," she said.

She said seven part-time stitchers work in the shop.



Typically, about one-third of them at a time are theater majors, one-third are students from Justin Hall, which houses classes in apparel design and marketing, and the rest are a mix of students from various majors.

"About one-third are kind of whoever wanders in. It's a real cross section," she said.



Men occasionally work in the shop, and Pinkston said in her experience, they pick up sewing better than women.

"I tell them it's like driving a car," she said.

4 K-State students earn Goldwater Scholarships

ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State has done it again.

Four K-State students received the $14,000 Barry M. Goldwater Scholarship for 1998.

This years' recipients are Tristan Kimbrell, junior in biology; Jace Kohlmeier, sophomore in mathematics and computer science; Wesley Schawe, junior in mathematics and Teresa Sweat, sophomore in biology.

Kimbrell said when he applied for the Goldwater Scholarship, he didn't think luck was on his side.

"Actually, I didn't think I had the best chance in the world," he said, "but since K-State has such a good history, I thought I had an average chance."

▶ What do we think?
The Collegian editorial board says K-State's awards are something to be proud of. See Page 4.

Kimbrell said his mother told him on April 1 that he won the scholarship.

"The award letter went home, and my mom called and told me," he said. "It was on April 1 when she told me, so I thought she was joking. She had to reassure me."

Besides the Goldwater Scholarship, Kimbrell has numerous other achievements, including National Merit Finalist, K-State Presidential Scholar and 1997 Division of Biology Most Promising Student.

KIMBRELL

Kohlmeier said receiving the Goldwater was a great honor.

"I'm really lucky to be at K-State because there is such a tradition in scholars," he said. "I felt really fortunate to have as much help on it as I did in the process."

KOHLMEIER

Kohlmeier said winning the Goldwater had been a goal of his since he came to K-State.

"I've been working toward it for quite a while," he said.

Kohlmeier's other accomplishments include Phi Kappa Phi Sophomore Scholar, Putnam Scholar and KSU Friends of Math Scholar.

SCHAWE

Schawe said he decided to apply for the Goldwater because his adviser and the head of the Department of Math encouraged him to.

"I figured when enough people told me, it must be a good thing," he said.

Schawe said he knew how tough the application process, which was necessary for K-State to nominate him to the Goldwater Committee, would be. But he said the worst thing to do is not apply because of that reason.

When he found out he won the Goldwater, Schawe said it

Vanilla Ice to perform at Wareham

TODD PACEY
Kansas State Collegian

Maybe you listened to him while in high school or middle school. Maybe you even went out and bought a copy of "To the Extreme." Maybe at bars or parties, you dance and sing along to the first rap song ever to reach No. 1 in the charts. Maybe you will go see him perform.

▶ Concert info
Tickets for the April 23 show at the Wareham Opera House cost $12 in advance and $14 at the door.

Vanilla Ice, a.k.a. Rob Van Winkle, is coming to Manhattan with the Vanilla Ice Posse. The 18-to-enter, 21-to-drink show is scheduled for April 23 at the Wareham Opera House. Tickets for the show cost $12 in advance and $14 at the door. KMKF-FM 101.5, co-sponsor of the event, will be giving away 10 meet-and-greet passes.

Doors will open at 8 p.m., with the Classy Cats performing for about half an hour beginning at 8:30 p.m. Announcers from KJ's Bar & Dance Club will spin dance music until Vanilla Ice performs at 10 p.m. Jeff Fellows said Ice's set probably will be 75 to 90 minutes long.

"After the show, people can use their ticket stubs to get in free to the after parties at KJ's and Chance," said Fellows, concert organizer and owner and manager of KJ's.

KJ's and Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon are also the places to purchase tickets for the show. Today is the first official day tickets go on sale, although some were sold over the weekend. With the Wareham's capacity of 650, Fellows said he expects the show to sell out quickly, similar to the two shows earlier this year, February 21 and 22, at the Granada in Lawrence.

This concert is the first such endeavor for Fellows, but he does not expect it to be the last. Fellows said he wants to bring to Manhattan a diverse range of bands people listened to in high school. He said many acts such as Tone Loc and Poison are currently on tour, and these are the groups he is pursuing.

"I just want to bring bands so everyone can have fun, whether it is for entertainment or to re-live high school memories. This concert is aimed directly at college students," Fellows said.

Although he has not yet seen Vanilla Ice, Fellows said he had talked to many who had seen him at either the Granada in Lawrence, Kan. or at Padre Island, Texas, during spring break. Fellows said those who had seen Vanilla Ice said he was a good entertainer.

Response to the show in Manhattan has been varied.

At the bars and parties this past weekend, many people were talking about the show.

Cultural showcase

DURING THE "FINE LADIES DANCE," LALIDA PANPRADIT OF THE THAI STUDENT ASSOCIATION PERFORMS AS PART OF THE CULTURAL PROGRAM AT INTERNATIONAL NIGHT IN MCCAIN AUDITORIUM. STUDENTS FROM ALL ACROSS THE WORLD SHOWCASED THEIR NATIVE CULTURES.

International Night offers students chance to share heritage with others

International Night festivities were the best opportunity for all countries represented at K-State to share their respective cultures with the community, a participant said Saturday night.

"I think that it would be nice if every nation represented here would try to participate in these occasions," said Jiriya Khampira, graduate student in public administration and Thai dancer.

Khampira said she wanted to introduce everyone to Thai culture by performing at International Night. She said Thai dance is sometimes misrepresented, particularly in movies.

"I think that people never know what is really Thai dance," she said. "This is a good time for us to share our culture with the people here."

International Night drew International Week to a close with a dinner and cultural show at McCain Auditorium, where international and American students showcased themselves and their cultures.

The night demonstrated the theme for the week: "One Earth, One People."

The evening began with a catered Greek dinner. Nine acts performed, featuring everything from 1950s swing dancing from the United States to a poetry reading by Stephen Bell of the United Kingdom.

Sarah Ryan, graduate student in student counseling and personnel services, said she enjoyed the African drumming the most.

"It was so impressive, the different pieces they did," she said. "It was very powerful."

She said she enjoyed the fashion show at the end as well. The fashion show included everything from colorful Japanese kimonos to a Pakistani wedding ensemble.

Ryan said she enjoyed seeing different aspects of the cultures represented.

"I think that we don't celebrate the different cultures that we have here at K-State enough, so it's wonderful to bring everyone together and be able to celebrate one another," she said.

The Thai Student Association celebrated its culture as it demonstrated a traditional Thai dance called the "Fine Ladies' Dance."

The variety continued after the cultural show as many of the students gathered at the International Student Center for a party where they danced to music from around the world and celebrated the close of International Week.

Manuri Nakkawita, International Coordinating Council president and senior in advertising, said even though the different performers were from diverse cultures, they have many similarities.

"If there is anything to learn, it is that how much we all have in common," she said. "We have so much in common. I guess that it goes with our theme — one earth, one people — truly."

Children's fashion show displays cultural colors

Nine children learned about other cultures as they displayed fashions from around the world in a children's fashion show Friday in the Union Courtyard.

The show featured fashions from Japan, India, Pakistan, the Democratic Republic of Congo, Cameroon, Indonesia and Nigeria. The children ranged in age from 18 months to 10 years.

Donna Davis, director of the International Student Center and mother of a participant, said she thinks it is good for the children to participate in the fashion show.

"A lot of these kids were not from the countries whose fashions they were wearing, so it gave them a little brush with cultures from other countries," she said.

Davis said children bring everyone together and represent hope for the future.

"All around the world everyone wants the best for their children," she said. "I think it is important for the adults, because the children bring out the happiness in all of us."

Five-year-old Gloria Tubene and her 3-year-old sister made the crowd laugh as they showed off dresses their grandma sent from Congo. They acted shy on the catwalk, although they said they had fun.

"I just wanted to walk around," Gloria said.

Alka Kapil, mother of two participants in the fashion show, said she was glad her children could participate in the show.

Student's car set on fire in parking lot; fraternity members help put out blaze

At first Richard Markley wasn't quite sure what was going on. All he knew was someone was waking him up to tell him his car was on fire.

"I was asleep, and someone came and woke me up. At first I thought they were joking around, but I got outside and I saw the smoke and I knew they weren't," Markley, freshman in elementary education, said.

It was early Saturday morning during a function with the Chi Omega sorority when several members of Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity looked out their windows and saw a fire in the corner of the parking lot.

"Just from what I heard, someone saw some flames over by the end of the parking lot and grabbed a fire extinguisher," Markley said.

When the group of partiers with the extinguisher arrived, they saw the burning 1988 Mercury Sable, which had just been painted.

"It was by my headlight. Evidently, the headlight kind of melted, and there's burn marks on the hood," Markley said.

Markley said he doesn't believe this was a vindictive act targeted at him specifically.

"I think it was pretty random. It was the farthest car in the parking lot," he said.

Despite the randomness, it apparently was arson, according to what the fire department told Markley. They also told him that due to melted wires in the headlight, he wasn't going to be able to drive his car.

"It's still really stressful, especially with finals coming up. I just don't want to go through all this hassle," Markley said.

Markley said he didn't enjoy informing his parents about the fire.

"I think that was the hardest part, having to call and tell them. I wasn't sure how they were going to take it," Markley said.

His parents were coming to Manhattan for the Easter holiday, so Markley had an opportunity to talk to them about it.

"They really didn't say that much. There's nothing we can do about it now," he said. "We'll see if it's covered by my insurance."

Rumors abound about what really happened. One member of Pi Kappa Alpha reported the fraternity really didn't know whose car it was, but that it was sitting in the middle of their parking lot.

Markley said he could see the humor in the situation and also could see some possible benefits.

"Hopefully, I'll get a new car out of it," he said.

Teen-aged girl, her boyfriend charged with killing girl's mother in Hutchinson

HUTCHINSON, Kan. — A 17-year-old girl and her 18-year-old boyfriend have been charged with killing the girl's mother.

Tracie Miles and Paul E. Nelson both are charged with first-degree murder in the March 26 strangulation and beating death of Sandra Miles. The victim's body was found March 30 at her Hutchinson home.

Miles and Nelson were arrested in El Paso, Texas, on Wednesday by local and federal authorities, Reno County Attorney Tim Chambers said.

Both suspects waived extradition to Kansas.

Chambers said the pair also could face charges of forgery and misdemeanor theft. Investigators said the couple forged Sandra Miles' signature and cashed a $2,000 check written on the victim's account.

Chambers filed a court motion Friday seeking to have Tracie Miles prosecuted as an adult. She was in custody at the Reno County Juvenile Detention Center. Her first court appearance is scheduled today before District Court Judge Patricia Macke Dick.

Nelson was in custody in El Paso on $500,000 bond. He was expected to be returned to Hutchinson next week.

Study shows baby boomers underestimate availability of marijuana to today's youth

NEW YORK — Although more kids are trying marijuana at an earlier age, baby boomer parents are convinced that doesn't apply to their children, according to a national study by the Partnership for a Drug-Free America.

"Boomers — many of whom have 'been there, done that' — are surprisingly and ironically out of step with the reality of drugs in their children's lives," Partnership President Richard D. Bonnette said.

The group's 10th poll, released Sunday, showed that parents underestimated the availability of marijuana, their children's view of its risks and whether their children's friends were smoking.

The study showed that among children ages 9 to 12, the number who had tried marijuana was up from 334,000 in 1993 to 571,000 last year — an increase from 3 percent to 5 percent of that age group.

Marijuana use among ages 13 to 16 remained stable, but there was a significant increase among 17- and 18-year-olds — from 41 percent in 1996 to 48 percent last year.

Astounding aerial feats, amazing acrobatics, precision balancing, extraordinary juggling – these alums of the Cirque du Soleil and the École National de Cirque do it all. The 11 artists and 4 musicians will take your breath away in a 90 minute show that will teach even the Ringling Brothers Barnum & Bailey troupe a thing or two. Recommended for audiences 5 years and older.

"Cirque Éloize is breathtaking in the extreme, crazy, death-defying, psychedelic, noisy and terrifying from the first moment it explodes into action. It quite simply has to be seen to be believed, because no-one in their right mind would believe what these people get up to on stage without seeing it first."

Zoo event teaches children while providing family fun

The mix of Easter eggs and animal education lured families to Sunset Zoological Park on Sunday, creating just what zoo officials had hoped for — eggstra-large crowds.

"Eggstravaganza" drew hundreds to the zoo for the afternoon event, which featured seven stations that helped teach small children about zoo animals. Candy and Easter eggs were the reward for right answers.

Marketing and Development Director Angie Fenstermacher said she had hoped at least 300 would attend the event, which started at 1 p.m. By 1:30, she said the crowd had already surpassed her expectations.

"We had a lot of people say, 'Oh, it's on Easter. I can't come because that's a family day,'" Fenstermacher said. "But other military and college families who were in town said this was a great idea."

High school and college students volunteered to coordinate the three-hour event, which was situated conveniently near the petting-zoo area so children could visit it as well.

Jenna Jones, freshman in biology, operated an education station where children named an animal that buried its eggs. After a correct answer, they searched for an egg of their own. She said young children learn easier when the new knowledge is coupled with fun.

"These kinds of things stick out in their heads, and they'll remember the animals this way," Jones said. "They seem to be having fun. The kids seem to like learning at this type of event."

Monica Doriguzzi, Ogden, Kan., drove her daughter Nikki, 4, to the zoo for Sunday's festivities. She said she and her daughter learned from the exhibits, especially one which featured actual eggs from various animals.

"I think the children had a great time," Doriguzzi said. "The egg exhibit was really neat. That was the most learning, was seeing the various eggs and the animals they go with."

"Especially with my candy," Nikki said.

Jared Bixby, sophomore in biology and natural history, also ran an "Eggstravaganza" station. He said planning the event around the Easter holiday helped boost the learning potential and the size of the crowd.

"You can get a much bigger turnout when you orient around a certain holiday," he said. "Everyone seems to be enjoying the event."

Fenstermacher said the zoo, which is funded by the city of Manhattan, planned the event in politically correct fashion.

"We try, because we're a municipality, not to call it an Easter event, but an egg event that happens to be on a holiday," she said.

Fenstermacher said the event was a way to kick off the spring season and to let the public know that the zoo is open for business.

"We wanted to have a spring activity that would give us an opportunity to get people out to the zoo and let them know the zoo is open," she said. "A lot of people think the zoo doesn't open until Memorial Day weekend, but we're open now and this is just a great way to get the kids and their family out here."

K-State excellence continues with Goldwater scholars

K-State's stellar tradition of winning prestigious national scholarships continues as four K-State students received the $14,000 Barry M. Goldwater scholarship for 1998.

The winners are Tristan Kimbrell, junior in biology; Jace Kohlmeier, sophomore in mathematics and computer science; Wesley Schawe, junior in mathematics; and Teresa Sweat, sophomore in biology.

The Goldwater Scholarship, an award set up by Congress for math and science students, provides money for up to two years of study. This year, all four students said they plan to use the scholarship to continue work and study at K-State.

The four students should be commended for their hard work and commitments to excellence. By continuing their study at K-State, all four students will generate scholarship and contribute to the success of each of their individual departments.

K-State has a long tradition of winning the national scholarships. The university ranks second in the nation with 34 Goldwater scholarship recipients. Princeton University is only one ahead of K-State.

During President Jon Wefald's tenure at K-State, there have been a total of more than 56 Rhodes, Marshall, Truman and Goldwater Scholarships, which ranks K-State first in the nation among all state universities.

This success is due, of course, to students willing to go the extra mile and set high standards for their research and academic work.

However, administrators have made scholarship and academic achievement a priority at K-State by identifying outstanding students and providing them with encouragement to achieve their goals and the opportunities to explore interesting areas of study.

Beth Powers, academic adviser, and faculty mentors can not be overlooked in the success of K-State scholars.

Higher education
Students need people to believe in them

During my spring break, I had the pleasure of meeting with a group of Latino students in an inner-city high school in Kansas City, Mo. The group was a newly formed organization promoting leadership through a variety of community service projects.

I was honored when the organization asked me to share experiences of higher education and discuss my post-graduation plans. The students were eager to hear about my experiences, and many of them have dreams of going to a university or a community college.

At this meeting, I met two high school seniors who have the potential to attend K-State or any university. But they both lacked one thing. It wasn't a financial obstacle or grades, because these students are at the top of their senior class. It was a lack of knowledge and availability of resources that stood in the way of either student continuing through higher education.

This was déjà vu. A few years ago, while meeting with some Latino students from Kansas, I saw the same thing. That time was more irritating because the students I talked to said their high school counselor suggested maybe they should not waste their time at a four-year institution and should look into a trade school or the local job market. The main employers in this town were meat-packing plants.

In both cases, the high school counselors and faculty administrators did not offer help to students who wanted to continue with their education. This treatment gave the students no other alternative but to form a club to ensure they could learn about different universities and colleges all on their own. Both this group and the group from Missouri push for excellency and strive to attain higher education even though some high school faculty write them off as non-college students.

At this meeting, I felt helpless. I shared a little of the college experience but felt more capable of reaching these students through my own triumph and struggles. The students were eager to hear about my experiences. I explained the cycle of treatment to which minority students are subject and how this treatment was repeated.

The students' vision of going to a university or a local college grew as I spoke, and I could see it in their eyes. I shared with them that while in high school, I was thought of by some high school teachers as non-college material, a slow learner and a low-potential student. Our experiences were parallel, and my successful completion of a degree in higher education was what these students needed to see. The idea of success needs to be reinforced to all minorities.

Higher education is not as hard as everyone makes it out to be. To see people of a similar culture who have accomplished their goal pushes each and every one of these students to believe they can accomplish their own goals. I know many of the students I spoke to had the initiative and self-motivation to achieve their goals.

However, for some students it might be a little late. The students struggling are those to whom counselors and teachers have turned their backs. All too often, many inner-city students' futures are not thrown away by the students themselves but by those counselors and teachers.

It's time to break down the stereotypes that many people have of inner-city high school students. It's time counselors and teachers stop focusing or predicting which high school students can make it and which can not. The students most likely to succeed are the only ones these counselors and teachers in the inner city seem to want to help.

I was able to get two of the students in attendance to visit our campus last week. Hopefully, their visit and experience will lead them to continue with higher education. I believe they are going to succeed at any institution they attend. That's what young people need — more people who believe in them.

Leaders, revolutionaries make differences in life

Issue No. 1 — I have decided there is too much negative news in the newspaper. Therefore, I will now end my columns with some sort of warm and fuzzy quote. Readers, you have two options about my warm and fuzzy quotes. You can either roll your eyes, or use your eyes to read the quote and think about it.

Issue No. 2 — I have also decided this week is "Be Nice to Accountants" week. No remarks about them being four-eyed, pencil-pushing geeks are allowed this week or for the rest of my existence.

Issue No. 3 — The actual column.

It was a groundbreaking issue for Time magazine. This week's issue did not mention President Clinton or any of the alleged incidents on the cover of the magazine. True, Clinton still received about 10 pages of coverage, but Time decided to focus the April 13 edition on a much bigger scale.

The cover of this week's Time magazine was titled "Leaders and Revolutionaries: A look at the most influential people of our century." People like Presidents Franklin Roosevelt and Ronald Reagan, Prime Ministers Winston Churchill and Margaret Thatcher and two of my least favorite people — Adolf Hitler and the Ayatollah Khomeini — were discussed, and it was interesting to be reminded about the effect these people had at an international level. This is a century that, as Time put it, "has been one of the most amazing: inspiring, at times horrifying, always fascinating."

Although I never met any of these people, they have had an indirect influence on my life. One of Roosevelt's New Deal programs, the Civilian Conservation Corps, put my Grandpa Dethloff to work so he could eat during the Great Depression and live a full life, and Thatcher helped me out long ago by being such a singular leader on whom I could write a term paper.

But no matter how much I read about these leaders and revolutionaries and their influences on the world, I discovered the direct influences in a person's life should be the people whom you can actually see, touch and talk to.

People need strong and positive influences — the people who challenge you and will be there for you during the dark times to help you see the sunlight. By influencing yourself with negative people who always see the glass half empty, your character will reflect theirs. It is your decision to make.

The people who have influenced me since I left my parents — the architects of my life — and have moved to Manhattan possess qualities I find to be outstanding — vision, belief in principle, conviction, strength of spirit and a heart the size of the galaxy.

Plus, some of them may make the cover of Time someday. They will make a difference, not only on the grand scale, but because they started with one of the "little people" — me.

I always have been taught that to succeed, you need personal qualities such as perseverance, honesty, dedication and compassion. But what took a while for me to realize is that whom you spend time with and allow into your life also affects those personal qualities.

Look at any successful person, and you will never find that person alone. So thank those influences who make your life better. Thank you Audrey, Barbara, Casey, Gabe and Tim.

The heights by great men reached and kept
Were not attained by sudden flight,
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward in the night.

Reader urges university, city to improve campus crosswalks before injuries occur

Editor,

I am writing in regard to the Denison Avenue crosswalks. I would like to thank the university for taking immediate action on the lighting improvements of these dangerous crosswalks. I also am concerned about other crosswalks on campus. I've noticed a few students have written to the Collegian voicing their opinions about crosswalk safety. As a student of K-State, I also believe the city and the university need to take action on these other campus crosswalks before another person gets injured or even killed.

Wefald should be commended for decision to reactivate his e-mail account, reader says

Editor,

I'm writing about an article published Wednesday titled "Wefald reactivates e-mail account." I would like to commend President Jon Wefald on this decision. I know he said his office door is open all the time, but in reality, it isn't. I recently tried to make an appointment with Wefald, and due to his busy schedule that week, I was unable to talk to him about some important school issues.

By reopening his e-mail account, it makes it much more convenient for me as well as other students to contact him. I know it may seem less personal to interact with students or even faculty through e-mail, but it's much easier. Again, I think Wefald should be commended on this decision because it shows great dedication to the students as well as the faculty of K-State.

Dismissal of Paula Jones' case wise decision based on lack of substantial facts in trial

Editor,

The dismissal by Federal District Judge Susan Webber Wright (a Republican appointee) of Paula Jones' civil lawsuit on April Fool's Day provided a humorous backdrop to a case that was never anything more than a joke. In his recent "Viewpoint" column, however, Paul Robben said the judge's decision "typifies America's lax view of sexual harassment."

The only thing Wright's decision typifies is good jurisprudence and common sense. Jones' politically inspired and malicious lawsuit never had anything to do with sexual harassment. As recently stated in the Arkansas Times, Jones' lawsuit was never more than legal harassment of the president, intended to merge with Kenneth Starr's investigation.

Perhaps the result of poor ventilation in his chemistry lab, Robben said "Wright's dismissal of Jones' claim because she couldn't demonstrate 'outrage' is egregious." Egregious? Hardly.

Regarding Jones' claim of outrage, Wright said "Notwithstanding the offensive nature of the governor's alleged conduct, plaintiff admits that she never missed a day of work following the alleged incident, she continued to work at AIDC another 19 months (leaving only because of her husband's job transfer), she continued to go on a daily basis to the Governor's Office to deliver items and never asked to be relieved of that duty, she never filed a formal complaint or told her supervisors of the incident ... she never consulted a psychiatrist, psychologist, or incurred medical bills as a result of the alleged incident ..."

If Robben truly wishes to champion the rights of those who are sexually harassed, there are plenty of others who are more deserving of his outrage and concern.

Urick says ticket price increase was made on recommendation of student fee committee

Editor,

We appreciate the editorial concerning student football ticket price increases and agree we should be able to justify our decision. As we previously discussed in our interview with the Collegian, it was recommended by the Student Privilege Fee Committee to implement a user-based system of funding inflationary adjustments, marketplace increases and operational cost hikes.

Student Sen. Aaron Truax suggested we look into raising student football ticket prices as an alternative to the privilege fee funding that was taken away from the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics. The committee said it thought it was more fair and equitable to ask those who attend athletic events to help fund operational and inflationary increases in intercollegiate athletics.

The most recent three-year agreement presented to the athletic department by the Student Senate states student football ticket prices will be $2 less than the general public rate, and the student seating at KSU Stadium will be at least 7,500 seats.

Student tickets are $14 less than the general public tickets, and at least 9,000 seats have been and will continue to be provided to our supportive student body. There is no bitterness over a failed referendum, just the desire to make K-State athletics the best possible experience for all of our student-athletes and student-supporters alike.

The ten-year history of public, faculty and student football ticket prices might provide additional perspective. Thank you for your support.

Max Urick
director of athletics

"TREES ACT AS A BUFFER ZONE AROUND OUR COMMUNITIES."

DAVID WRIGHT, PROGRAM COORDINATOR

ARBOR DAY USA

Organization distributes trees free to schools

Spring has sprung, so it's once again time to think about sprucing up the outdoors. Small plants and flowers might be more affordable, but don't leave out the trees.

Arbor Day USA, a charitable environmental organization, is distributing free trees, available to anyone who wants them. The trees will come from farms across the country that have surpluses. These farms estimated large tree sales that didn't pan out. The trees are being given away so they won't go to waste.

"Trees act as a buffer zone around our communities," David Wright, program coordinator, said. "2.2 trees are no longer in existence for every person born. The population is rising, while the number of trees is declining. We're trying to counteract that."

Wright said although there is a great deal of tree planting in the United States, the organization promotes more planting to counteract tree loss in other parts of the world.

"We are trying to compensate for tree loss in places like Brazil. The more trees we plant the less susceptible we are to the damage being caused," Wright said.

Households can receive between five and 25 trees for planting. Schools can receive up to 250 trees for Earth Day or Arbor Day. People whose land damage is from flooding and other natural disasters can get as many as 25 to 75 trees to replace those lost.

The only cost involved with the program is the shipping fee. There is a minimum fee of $4.88 per every five free trees ordered, but an additional donation also can be included that is tax deductible.

The trees come with planting instructions as well as a replacement guarantee.

Two web sites are available to process requests. This saves paper as well as trees, which helps support the organization's goal. The sites are: www.freetrees.com and www.arborday.com.

"We're simply giving a little assistance to the environment. Mother Earth is not all she once was. She used to be able to take care of herself, but now we need to be really, really careful with her," Wright said.

Tree planting not difficult with knowledge, preparation

DIANA LEE
Kansas State Collegian

The time when new trees are planted is a crucial one. But tree care need not be a difficult endeavor.

"You should dig a planting hole, making it eight to 12 inches wider than the container or root ball. If it is in a container, you should carefully remove it. If it's covered in burlap, it should not be removed, but slit in about three places," Dorothy Westervelt, secretary at Blueville Nursery, said.

Westervelt also said it is helpful to put a tarp down when digging the planting hole.

"If you put the dirt you remove from the hole on a tarp, it makes the process a lot easier. It is very difficult to remove dirt from the grass," she said.

Westervelt suggests using a root stimulator initially when putting the tree in the ground and again two weeks later.

"Using a root stimulator will help give the tree nice, strong roots right from the beginning," she said.

Making sure the tree is adequately watered at all times is also important.

"When establishing any bare-root tree, it is very important to keep it watered during the transition," said David Wright, coordinator of the Arbor Day USA free tree program.

The trees need to be watered every seven to 10 days, depending on the amount of rainfall.

"It is best to check around the base and feel to see if the tree needs water," Westervelt said.

Westervelt said it is helpful to put mulch around the bottom of the tree, but also use tree wrap when autumn comes.

"In the fall, rabbits will hide in the mulch and attack the bark, so tree wrap can help protect your young tree," she said.

Westervelt said it is important to watch for summertime insects.

"If insects start in on your tree, you need to treat it as soon as possible," she said.

She also suggested reading the labeling on insect repellents carefully to make sure to pick the treatment the tree needs and ensure it is being used in the proper proportions.

It is best to plant the tree immediately upon receipt, but this can be worked around a little bit.

"You shouldn't wait more than a couple of days to plant. If you can't plant the trees right away, you should probably put them in a refrigerator," Wright said.

There is no magic formula to tree care, but Westervelt said it is not difficult to grow healthy trees.

"All it really takes is some tender loving care in the first two years," she said.

Cats suffer first shutout of '98 in weekend sweep by Sooners

NORMAN, Okla. — K-State wrapped up its trip to Oklahoma on a sour note, as the 10th-ranked Sooners completed a three-game series sweep of the Wildcats with a 10-0 win Sunday at L. Dale Mitchell Park in Norman.

Sunday's game marked the first shutout of K-State since Wichita State blanked the Cats 8-0 on May 7, 1997. It also signaled the end of the second-worst series for K-State in the Mike Clark era, with the Cats being outscored 43-10 over the three-game set. A minus-34 scoring differential in a series loss to Oklahoma State (May 10-12, 1996) remains the worst series defeat under Clark.

Oklahoma (29-8, 9-4) used an eight-run fourth inning to break open a scoreless game. First baseman Casey Bookout had the big blow, swatting his Big 12 Conference-leading 20th home run of the season, a three-run blast to left-center that traveled more than 420 feet. Richard Park followed with a solo blast, ending the day for K-State starter Mickey Blount, who allowed all eight runs in the frame as his record fell to 2-2 this season.

Eric Sommerhauser had a hit for the Cats, extending his hitting streak to eight games.

However, K-State could muster just five hits off Oklahoma's Jared Hoerman, who went the distance to improve to 4-1 this season. With the loss, K-State drops to 0-9 on the road in Big 12 play and has lost its past 13 road contests, dating back to a 15-5 setback at Air Force on Feb. 14.

The Cats return to action at 7 p.m. Tuesday when they play host to Fort Hays University.

Minnesota makes twin killing after taking last 2 from Royals

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Bob Tewksbury was more concerned about his health than his pitching Sunday.

Then again, his performance against Kansas City didn't give him much to worry about.

Tewksbury allowed four hits in six innings, and Pat Meares hit two home runs as the Minnesota Twins beat the Royals 7-2.

"Sometimes being under the weather works to your advantage," said Tewksbury, who took antibiotics before the game. "Sometimes you have your best days when you aren't feeling well. When you aren't trying too hard it works to your advantage."

Tewksbury (2-1), who improved to 4-0 at Kauffman Stadium, allowed one earned run and one walk. Rick Aguilera struck out Dean Palmer with the bases loaded in the ninth for his second save.

Ron Coomer, who went three-for-four, led off the seventh inning with his first home run of the year to make it 3-1. One out later, Meares got a ball in the wind for a 442-foot homer to chase starter Hipolito Pichardo (0-1).

"Pichardo may have been getting a little tired," Meares said. "He got behind in the count. I wasn't trying to hit it out. I was trying to stay short on the ball. Sometimes that is best."

Pichardo allowed seven hits and four earned runs in six 1-3 innings.

The Twins added another run in the inning off reliever Matt Whisenant when Paul Molitor singled in Otis Nixon.

Meares' second homer of the game and season came in the ninth against Jim Pittsley. It was the second multi homer game of his career. He also hit two homers on June 19, 1994, at Baltimore.

The Royals have allowed 14 home runs in their first 11 games.

"We've had a lot of balls hit out of the park against us," Manager Tony Muser said. "That means we're throwing pitches up and out over the plate. We've got to keep the ball down and keep it in the park and give our defense a chance."

Texas hires Clemson's Barnes to succeed Penders as coach

AUSTIN, Texas — Clemson's Rick Barnes is the new basketball coach at Texas, replacing Tom Penders, the Longhorns' winningest coach who resigned after a player revolt.

Barnes met with Clemson players in South Carolina late Sunday and was to be formally introduced on Monday afternoon at a news conference in Austin .

His hiring, announced Sunday night in a faxed news release from the university, ends a search that began when Penders resigned April 2.

The search had focused on Utah's Rick Majerus until Sunday morning, when negotiations broke down with the Utes' coach, said two university sources who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity.

But Majerus had always been a difficult target because he makes roughly $1 million at Utah, and Texas athletic director DeLoss Dodds had said the basketball coach wouldn't make more than new football coach Mack Brown, who earns $750,000 annually.

Penders made $550,000 per year.

Barnes, 43, met with Texas officials Thursday in Atlanta and then again on Friday in Dallas, and he impressed screening committee members with his hard-nosed, defense-minded approach.

Dodds has said he would like a coach who stresses defense.

He also fit Dodds' financial criteria, making just less than $700,000 per year at Clemson.

SENIOR TENNIS STANDOUT YANA DORODNOVA WILL PLAY HER LAST COLLEGIATE HOME TENNIS MATCH TODAY AGAINST BAYLOR.

▸K-STATE TO PLAY BAYLOR IN SENIORS' HOME FINALE.

TIM RICHARDSON
Kansas State Collegian

The seniors on K-State's tennis team will play the final home match of their careers today at 1 p.m. as the Baylor Bears come to Manhattan.

The Wildcats, 9-10 overall, 5-5 in Big 12 Conference play, are coming off a 9-0 win against Missouri last Tuesday. The win against the struggling Tigers was not a big surprise to K-State coach Steve Bietau.

"It's a situation where we could create trouble for ourselves, but as long as we got down to business, we were going to win the match," he said.

Reaching the .500 mark, which could be accomplished with a win today, has not been a team focus.

"We just want to get some wins against good teams," Bietau said.

The Cats saw Baylor at a tournament in Indiana last fall. Bietau said he has seen most of the players on the court and is aware of what the team needs to work on to prepare for the match.

"Unfamiliarity is not a problem," he said.

The team has worked on improving its doubles and being consistent.

The final home match of the season is unlikely to bring about any significant changes. Bietau, who does not announce the lineup prior to the game, said each senior will not necessarily play today.

"I don't anticipate any large changes to our lineup," he said.

Bietau said it's still too early to reflect on what already has happened in the season, and the team will continue to look forward to today's match and the rest of the season.

"I'd rather focus on what's coming up than what's in the past," he said.

The meet is scheduled for 1 p.m. at the L.P. Washburn Recreational Area. If weather does not permit outdoor play, the meet will be moved to Ahearn Field House.

Bietau said 'the seniors — Yana Dorodnova, Lena Piliptchak, Chris Schulte and Dinah Watson — will want to make a strong showing in today's match — their last at K-State.

"I hope that they have a sense that our team still has some things to accomplish," he said.

1998 MASTERS

Couples, Duval falter as O'Meara claims Masters title

ASSOCIATED PRESS

AUGUSTA, Ga. — Mark O'Meara has taught Tiger Woods a lot about life on the PGA Tour. Maybe Woods taught O'Meara how to win a Masters.

Closing in a very Tigerlike fashion with birdies on three of the last four holes, O'Meara stole the show Sunday from the greatest master of them all — Jack Nicklaus — who made a thrilling run at a seventh green jacket.

O'Meara had played in 56 major championships without winning, but when he rolled in a 20-foot birdie putt on the final hole at Augusta National Golf Club that streak ended.

When the ball disappeared from sight, O'Meara thrust his arms defiantly into the air and wrapped them around caddie Jerry Higgenbothem. The 18-year wait to win a major championship was over.

That birdie marked the only time O'Meara led during the four days of play as he closed with a 67 and finished at 9-under-par 279, one stroke ahead of Fred Couples and David Duval.

"I don't think it's sunk in yet," O'Meara said after Woods, his close friend and the defending champion, put the winner's green jacket on him and gave O'Meara a big hug.

"I'll treasure it for a lifetime," O'Meara said. "I walked to the 17th tee thinking I could still make two birdies."

That's exactly what he did, hitting a great iron to seven feet on No. 17 and then making the 20-footer on the last hole to become the first player since Arnold Palmer in 1960 to win the Masters by closing with two consecutive birdies.

"What does Tiger mean to Mark O'Meara?" O'Meara said. "You know, I compete against him. I have to find some way to get around the advantages he has. I think he has brought my game up a bit."

Now the 14-time winner on the PGA Tour with more than $9 million in career earnings can scratch his name off the list of great golfers who have never won a major championship.

And perhaps O'Meara, 41, and Woods, 22, both have been helped by the golf matches they play in their community near Orlando, Fla., where O'Meara counsels Woods on how to handle the pressure of life on tour.

"Mark has been like a big brother to me," Woods said.

And Woods has taught O'Meara some things about his game. When O'Meara asked Woods to give him strokes on the par-5 in their friendly matches, Woods pointed out the advantage O'Meara has.

"He says, 'You've got a putter,'" O'Meara said. "I said, 'You're right,' and the putter won for me this week."

Couples and Duval played well enough to win but were simply victims of O'Meara's putter. He averaged barely more than 26 putts a round and with 105 had the fewest in the tournament on the tricky Augusta National greens.

The tournament appeared headed for a playoff when Duval, playing in the group in front of O'Meara and Couples, missed a 20-foot birdie try on the final hole to finish at 8-under par.

Couples and O'Meara were also at 8-under coming to the last tee, but Couples, who drove into the fairway bunker and then hit the greenside bunker, could only make par.

"I started three back, and I shot a 67," Duval said. "Doggone it, that ought to be enough to win here, but it wasn't."

The 70 posted by Couples was also good enough — except for his wild adventure through the trees and water on No. 13, where he made a double-bogey.

O'Meara weaves through Augusta's heavy traffic en route to championship

Highway 279. That's the road, stroke by stroke, it took for Mark O'Meara to win the 1998 Masters.

Some tried to take that road. More golfers than in recent years came in on roads very close to O'Meara's.

Both David Duval and 1992 green-jacket winner Fred Couples rode in right behind O'Meara at 280.

Jim Furyk was a road over with 281. Paul Azinger, the man who battled cancer to be the tournament's feel-good story, came in alone on 282.

And two surprises — David Toms puttered into the Masters after winning the Quad City Classic last season. Both Toms and six-year Masters master Jack Nicklaus — comparable only to a classic Cadillac — cruised down highway 283 with Toms.

The Cadillac, playing in his 40th Masters, was the last day's story, chipping away at the lead with birdie putt after birdie putt.

He finished in the top 10 for the 22nd time in his career.

But only one road was the one to the cabin housing the fireplace and the coveted green jacket. And all these golfers had a wild ride getting there.

Couples began Sunday at 6-under-par, up two strokes on Azinger, O'Meara and Phil Mickelson. Like a Land Cruiser, Couples smoothly rolled through the front nine in the lead — until he hit a massive speed bump at hole 13.

Couples drove his ball into the trees to the left of the fairway and chipped out of it only to get tied up in Rae's Creek. This double-bogey dropped the Land Cruiser back two strokes.

Duval, like the the highway patrol car that has no identifying lights on it, had snuck up to 9-under-par by birding three of the first four on the back nine. Out from behind, Duval had some trouble with the law on hole 16, three-putting the hole for bogey. He dropped to and remained at 8-under.

VIEWPOINT

SUN DEE MILLS

Sun Dee is a senior in electronic journalism. You can send e-mail to Sun Dee at sundee@ksu.edu.

Mickelson, who has played Augusta National well in recent years, began the day tied for second at 4-under. But his unreliable Ford Tempo blew up on him, and he finished at a disappointing 2-under-par. Mickelson was just one stroke behind last year's trendy version of an Eddie Bauer Ford Explorer, 1997 champion Tiger Woods.

But neither of these cars/golfers were in contention on the tangled roads that made up the last four holes. These holes resembled a metropolitan city's thoroughfare tied up with construction. One lane was open, and Couples, Duval, O'Meara, Azinger and Furyk were racing to be the car leading the traffic.

The Land Cruiser eagled hole 15 to break away from the numerous pack of players at 6-under. He was now riding right alongside the patrol car, eager to pass but not wanting to take risks, such as getting pulled over by more water hazards.

O'Meara, a classy Toyota Camry (Well, he was wearing a Toyota hat, so we don't want to get him in trouble with his sponsors), birdied the 500-yard par-5 hole 15 in an attempt to pass those also at 6-under.

At 7-under, he could look to his co-leaders, the Land Cruiser and the patrol car, and wave.

Azinger was well ahead of his playing partner, the Tempo, and had a chance to birdie hole 16. His ball missed its exit, lipping the cup and rolling out. He would finish at 6-under.

Furyk's ball had a similar problem as he tried to reach 8-under late in his fourth round. He couldn't quite get there and walked into the clubhouse with co-leader Duval at 7-under.

Duval had a chance, but the sneaky patrol car's ball sped past the 18th hole. Duval missing this 20-foot putt on his 72nd hole did not allow him to take a lead with him into the clubhouse.

A playoff seemed inevitable. The Land Cruiser and the Camry approached the 18th hole neck-in-neck. But The Land Cruiser hit bunker-to-bunker traffic. His tee shot went into a fairway bunker, and his chip off the beach landed on another beach by the green.

Couples was looking at a definite par, if not a bogey.

Meanwhile, the Camry stayed right on the path. O'Meara already had birdied holes 15 and 17, and if he sunk his 18th-hole birdie putt, he'd end up the third player in history to birdie hole 72 to win the major.

It was about the same distance as the one Duval had just missed.

The gallery, who'd been cheering on the Cadillac and young amateur Matt Kucher all day, held their collective breath as the quiet Camry pulled up for its possibly final move.

The ball rolled slowly to the hole, hitting the left side of the cup and rolling in. The understated Camry had taken over the lead, and O'Meara had just won his first major. "Oh, what a feeling," O'Meara had to have been thinking as he leapt into the air and hugged his caddy. He set the record for number of attempts at the Masters title with 14. The tournament had all the thrills involved in driving to a downtown workplace through massive amounts of spaghettilike highways. The drivers were constantly in danger of losing their grip on the path ahead.

O'Meara rolled ahead at the last minute to grab the rock-star parking space next to the cabin. He sat next to Kucher and Woods, saying what he'd just done hadn't sunk in yet. Woods beamed with pride as he struggled to get his friend and neighbor's arm into the new green jacket. Kucher just beamed, especially when he was told the last low amateur to play Augusta National was sitting two chairs down.

Kucher's car comparison is easy.

Finishing his 72 holes at even-par, Kucher is the Seville STS that had been advertised all day. He's what's next.

Senate Finance Committee to examine alleged abuse in IRS tax investigations

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A new report is challenging the fairness of Internal Revenue Service criminal prosecutions, spotlighting cases where small U.S. cities had more convictions per capita than prominent business centers.

The Senate Finance Committee, which is preparing another series of high-profile hearings looking into IRS horror stories, is expected to review the report just two weeks after the April 15 tax-filing deadline.

The committee also is expected to hear cases alleging IRS agents abused citizens' rights in criminal tax cases, according to several sources who have met with Senate investigators.

The study by the Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse, or TRAC, reported per capita tax convictions were twice the national average in IRS offices in Pensacola, Fla.; Greensboro, N.C.; Memphis, Tenn.; and Charleston, W.Va.

But prominent business centers, including Los Angeles, Chicago, Boston and Detroit, reported lower than average criminal convictions, TRAC said.

The IRS said the TRAC data and the study's conclusions are flawed. But David Burnham, an author and research professor with Syracuse University who helped prepare the study, said the variation raises troubling questions about management of IRS criminal matters.

"You can see large and hard-to-explain variations on the criminal side that I think raise questions about fairness and effectiveness of the agency," Burnham said.

Burnham said he's been asked to testify about his findings during the Senate hearings this month; committee staff decline to discuss witnesses.

The TRAC statistics are drawn from Justice Department and Administrative Office of the Courts computer records; the IRS won't supply its records to Burnham, saying they contain confidential details about investigations.

A senior IRS official criticized the TRAC report.

"We think there are a number of issues there that make that data incorrect," said Ted F. Brown, IRS assistant commissioner for criminal investigations. Brown said problems with the TRAC data result in misleading conclusions.

Brown said one problem is the study uses Justice Department computer records, which don't match IRS computer systems.

An analysis of this Justice data might show regional disparities because the districts of U.S. Attorneys don't align with the 33 IRS districts nationwide, he said.

In addition, IRS criminal cases take several years to bring because of the complex analysis of financial records.

"We may invest a lot of time one year in the investigative stage so you don't have any prosecutions and convictions. And next year, they suddenly come out of the pipeline and the district jumps up," Brown said.

Burnham disagreed, saying his study showed variations among certain districts over time.

The Charleston, W.Va., district, for example, has been in the top fifth of criminal convictions per capita since 1992.

But Los Angeles ranked in the bottom three-fifths during the same period, even though other highly populated areas such as Manhattan, N.Y., and the District of Columbia ranked about as well as Charleston.

The TRAC study also found wide variation in civil audits nationwide.

The upcoming four days of Senate hearings, scheduled to begin April 28, come after widely praised hearings into taxpayer abuses held last fall. The earlier hearings focused on an unresponsive IRS that allowed simple taxpayer problems to linger for years, causing great emotional and financial turmoil for taxpayers.

IRS defenders said while the cases described were inexcusable, they represented four of some 124 million individual tax returns expected to be filed this year.

For now, the committee is keeping a tight lid on the upcoming hearings. Senate Finance spokeswoman Ginny Flynn said the panel will continue its examination of IRS practices and procedures.

"Strong oversight means the committee cannot walk away from any additional evidence of wrongdoing or other problems within the agency," she said.

Monopoly accusations force Microsoft to amend contract

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — The world's most influential software company had a rule for some of the people it does business with: Don't do business with our competition.

An intricate contract between Microsoft and some of its key business partners said as much, though not in simple language. Was this good business practice, or unfair exercise of marketplace muscle?

Microsoft maintained it was merely the same as asking Michael Jordan not to wear Reebok when he's promoting Nike.

But on Thursday, after The Associated Press asked about the contract, the company said it would drop the exclusionary language.

Microsoft's critics viewed the language as a smoking gun in the Justice Department's expanding investigation of Bill Gates' empire, proof that the company unfairly thwarts competition.

Although the language is gone, the issues it raises remain in the broader dispute between the government and the software giant. Is Microsoft a monopoly? Is it using its power in the marketplace unfairly? And what constitutes "fair" in a rapidly shifting computer marketplace?

It might take the courts to decide. The outcome will determine who grows richer and more powerful in America's information economy. What's more, it will have an effect on how computers evolve and how we use them in our everyday lives. To understand this continuing story, you need to know a little about how computers and the Internet work. You also need to know something about antitrust laws.

A computer is nothing but a box of circuits, wires and microchips. By itself, this box is useless. It needs to be told what to do and a language to understand what it is told. The computer needs a set of instructions called an operating system.

Even with an operating system, a computer can't do much. It can't send e-mail, balance your checkbook or cruise the Internet. For that, it needs special programs designed to work with the operating system.

Several companies make operating systems. In the 1980s, it was a fiercely competitive market, with IBM, Apple and Microsoft all trying to sell you their systems. But in the early 1990s, through a combination of aggressive marketing by Microsoft and blunders by its competitors, Microsoft pulled ahead with its Windows operating system.

The market for desktop operating systems is fundamentally different from the market for a product such as sneakers. If Jordan wears Nikes, it doesn't matter if teammate Dennis Rodman wears Reeboks. Their choice of footwear will not affect their ability to play together.

But companies need computers that can talk to one another. So once they started buying Windows, they kept buying it, and Microsoft's small, early lead grew into a huge one. Success bred more success. The more popular Windows became, the more programs were written to work with Windows. Because Windows could do more, even more people wanted it.

Today, 85 percent of the personal computers in the world use Windows. And 95 percent of the new computers on the market come with Windows 95, the current version of Microsoft's operating system, already installed.

Microsoft's critics say this dominance constitutes a monopoly. Microsoft disagrees.

"A monopolist, by definition, is a company that has the ability to restrict entry by new firms and unilaterally control prices," Gates, chairman and chief executive of Microsoft, testified before Congress in March. "Microsoft can do neither."

That's not how case law generally defines a monopoly. The courts have ruled that a company is a monopoly if it controls 70 percent of a market.

Not that a monopoly is inherently illegal or even improper. Our capitalist system inevitably produces both winners and losers. The late Learned Hand, a prominent jurist, once said you can't encourage competition and then punish the winners.

But the winners have to play fair. They may not use their dominant position in the marketplace to scuttle competition or block innovation.

Antitrust laws set the rules for fair play. Microsoft and its critics disagree on whether the company is playing by the rules.

One area of concern to critics is Microsoft's plans for the World Wide Web.

To use the Web, you need more than a computer and an operating system. You need a program called a browser, which lets you navigate the Internet and see pictures, texts and graphics.

Other companies make browsers, foremost among them Netscape Communications Inc. In 1995, it controlled 80 percent of the market, almost as dominant in browsers as Microsoft is in operating systems.

Microsoft was slow to realize the potential of the Web. But when the company put the Web at the center of its business plans and released its own browser, Internet Explorer, it quickly gained ground. Today, Netscape has slipped to about 60 percent of the market while Microsoft controls about 35 percent. Many analysts expect Microsoft to surpass Netscape around midyear.

Here's how Microsoft did it: The company gave its browser away to everyone who bought its operating system. Because almost every computer sold today has Windows 95, almost everyone gets Microsoft's browser when buying a computer.

This is unfair, Netscape and other critics say.

According to the rules set by antitrust law, a monopoly company may not tie two products together — to virtually force you to take one product when you buy another. But are Microsoft's operating system and browser two separate products, or a single integrated product?

Microsoft's critics say they are separate products — that bundling them together is like building a microwave oven into a refrigerator. Microsoft argues that it is a single product — that the browser is just an improvement on its operating system, comparable to adding an ice maker to a refrigerator.

Other antitrust rules say you can't use your monopoly power to prevent people from competing with you for business. That's where the contract between Microsoft and some of its big business partners came in.

The agreement, a copy of which was obtained by The Associated Press, dealt with companies that specifically design Web pages to take advantage of features in Microsoft's browser. The browser makes it very easy to find these companies' Web pages.

Turn on your computer, and icons for these pages appear on the opening screen. Click on them and you go directly to the pages.

This prominent placement could be valuable. It could steer millions of users to a company's Web site. But there's a catch: If you agreed to be one of Microsoft's "Platinum Agreement" Web partners, you were restricted in dealing with other major companies making browsers, including Netscape. You couldn't promote other browsers on Web pages designed under the Platinum Agreement. And your content offerings couldn't be promoted on the rival browsers.

"Microsoft is saying, 'In order to get a place in our monopoly real estate, you can't do business with Netscape,'" Christine Varney, a Netscape lawyer, said. "That is using a monopoly power in an anticompetitive and predatory manner."

In its recent year-end filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, Netscape said Microsoft's practices "may materially adversely affect Netscape's business, operating results, or financial condition."

Microsoft spokesman Mark Murray was adamant. "There's no basis for anyone to believe that these agreements are in any way anticompetitive," he said. "These kinds of decisions are primarily business decisions."

Then, on Thursday, Microsoft dropped the exclusionary provisions in the contract, including those preventing companies from featuring Netscape's logo and those preventing companies from paying Netscape to be in their channel listing.

About 10 big companies had signed the Platinum Agreement, but Microsoft declined to say who they were. Several of Microsoft's big Web partners, including USA Today, Dow Jones & Co., CNN and Wired Ventures Inc., refused to comment on their agreements with Microsoft.

Three ways to beat the high cost of college.
1. The Montgomery GI Bill
2. Student loan repayment
3. Part-time income
The Army Reserve Alternate Training Program is a smart way to pay for college.
First, if you qualify, the Montgomery GI Bill can provide you with up to $7,124 for current college expenses or approved vo/tech training.
Second, if you have—or obtain—a qualified student loan not in default, you may get it paid off at the rate of 15% per year or $500, whichever is greater, up to a maximum of $10,000. Selected military skills can double that maximum.
Third, you can earn part-time money in college, and here's how it works: One summer you take Basic Training, and the next summer you receive skill training at an Army school. You'll earn over $1,500 for Basic and even more for skill training. Then you'll attend monthly meetings at an Army Reserve unit near your college, usually one weekend a month plus two weeks a year. You'll be paid over $107 a weekend to start. It's worth thinking about. Give us a call:

RANIA KAMHAWI, A DANCER AND CHOREOGRAPHER, SPEAKS FRIDAY AT THE INTERNATIONAL STUDENT CENTER ABOUT DANCE IN JORDAN. KAMHAWI IS A FULBRIGHT SCHOLAR.

Scholar visits K-State to share cultural experience

ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

As part of International Week, a Fulbright Scholar visited K-State on Friday to speak about the dance trend she started in Jordan and the use of theater to teach children.

Rania Kamhawi, a dancer and choreographer, said she spent 10 years in England studying dance, starting at age 11. Kamhawi said when she returned to Jordan, she saw a need for dance.

"I introduced dance to Jordan nine years ago," she said. "Dancing existed in Jordan, but only in a very, very limited matter, and I've really tried to expand that."

Kamhawi said dance in Jordan was encouraged by the youth.

"The population of Jordan is about 4.2 million," she said. "What encouraged the development of theater and arts and dance in Jordan is the fact that 50 percent of the people are under the age of 18."

Kamhawi said she worked to use dance, theater and drama to help children learn rather than the traditional behind-the-desk learning. She does this through an affiliation with the nonprofit organization, the Noor Al Hussein Foundation.

The foundation has a Theater-in-Education program that incorporates theater into the educational program to expand the ways children learn, Kamhawi said.

"This brings closer together the teachers with their students," she said.

Kamhawi said the program includes a teacher-in-role activity where the teachers act out who they are talking about, and the children have to figure out the person.

The second type of activity the program has introduced, Kamhawi said, is an investigative team of students. The students read clues and look at artifacts to guess an event or person in history, she said.

"We thought that was a much better way of the children and students retaining their information rather than just being lectured," Kamhawi said.

Jordan has adopted a method in which all public schools are requested to have at least one class in creative learning, she said.

Kamhawi showed a video of the different types of theater and dance that are done for the children.

One scene was an interactive musical interpretation of "The Wizard of Oz."

Kamhawi said the characters in the musical ask the children in the audience questions.

"The audience is always involved," she said.

Besides involvement in the Theater-in-Education, Kamhawi also teaches dance and does her own productions.

Kamhawi began teaching five students a week, and now she teaches 200 students a week. She said she gives scholarships to most of her students because she wants dance to be available to everyone.

"I did not want dance to become an elitist form of art," she said.

Norman Fedder, professor of theater, said he saw Kamhawi perform in front of 10,000 people at the Roman Amphitheater.

He said she performed dances that combined a variety of culture experiences.

"It was overwhelming," he said. "The most important thing is that you can see or hear from her how dynamic she is as a person."

Fedder said Kamhawi was pioneering the dance movement in Jordan without being exclusive or elitist. He said she's trying to bring dance to all members of society.

"Her courage — it's heartwarming," he said.

Group works for diversity

The American Ethnic Studies Student Association inaugurated its Student Diversity Leadership Initiative on Thursday.

The initiative, which includes five separate phases to take place over the next year, is designed to train participants to help others cope with an increasingly diverse environment.

"We're looking as a campus committee to improve diversity on campus, in the community and in our own organized living groups," said Todd Nicewonger, senior in speech and president of the AESSA.

The five phases include a daylong workshop Saturday where participants return to the organizations sponsoring them and create a workshop to enrich diversity within their organization.

The purpose of the leadership initiative was to promote intercultural competency.

"An ability to learn how to develop your skills in the community or interactive experiences with people from a variety of differences," Nicewonger said.

Juanita McGowan, assistant professor of sociology, anthropology, and social work and director of the American ethnic studies program, said diversity training is necessary to make K-State a No. 1 school.

"We must be able to promote diversity on campus if we're going to be a top-notch university," McGowan said.

One of the objectives of the program involves introducing participants to the diversity issue. McGowan said it is an issue that too often is ignored.

"We must stop expecting time to solve the diversity problem. The largest growing statistical category is this group they call 'other.' If white is becoming the minority, who's coming to college?" McGowan said.

A panel of participants in the AESSA offered its own stories about times its members had to deal with the diversity issue.

"What should we do to promote diversity? We must realize that ending hate is the beginning and not the end of our mission," McGowan said.

Scholars to continue their studies at K-State was the highlight of his day.

"To say I was excited is probably an understatement," he said. "It made my day without a doubt."

Schawe's other accomplishments include Pi Mu Epsilon Math Honorary, Wal-Mart Competitive Edge Scholarship and Robert C. Byrd Scholarship.

Sweat said she found out at work she won the Goldwater Scholarship.

"They called me at work, and I was giving everybody the thumbs-up sign," she said. "Everyone was yelling and cheering, so we had a celebration right there at work."

Sweat said she wasn't sure when she started the application process if she had a good chance, but after she began her research, she said she thought there could be a chance.

"When I started my research, I though it was pretty important and maybe it will impress someone," she said.

Sweat said after she was nominated by K-State, she thought maybe she had a good chance of winning the scholarship.

"I knew K-State had had luck in the past," she said. "That's when I started thinking maybe this is going to happen."

Sweat was also a National Merit Scholar, KSU Presidential Scholar and has received many scholarships through the KSU Foundation.

All of this year's scholars plan to use their Goldwater Scholarships to continue study at K-State.

K-State ranks second in the nation with 34 Goldwater Scholarship recipients. Princeton University is only one ahead of K-State.

Academic adviser Beth Powers said each year K-State nominates four students for the scholarship. Every year except last year and the first two years the scholarship began, K-State has had four winners.

Powers said she thinks the reason K-State competes well with Ivy League schools, besides the students' hard work, is the K-State faculty.

"We have faculty that is committed to getting students into the lab and making them strong mathematicians, engineers and scientists," Powers said.

"It's really faculty mentoring that makes the difference."

Children's fashion show offers glimpse of international styles

"It is good to let them know what India is about," Kapil said. "They love to dress up, and they know that they want to learn about Indian culture."

Farha Aqeel, native of Pakistan, escorted her 18-month-old sister, Saher Aqeel, as they modeled traditional Pakistani attire.

Aqeel said the show demonstrated that children from one country are no different from children of another country.

"If you saw them over here, they were all messing up and were all nervous and laughing," she said. "They're just the same no matter where they are from. Just because they look different and wear some different clothes doesn't mean anything."

Jennie Roberts, junior in marketing, said she thought the show was interesting and liked the outfit Saher Aqeel from Pakistan was wearing.

"I thought the little girl in the little satin outfit was the cutest," she said. "It was very elaborate."

Nausheen Kazi, senior in hotel and restaurant management and native of Pakistan, said Aqeel's outfit is called a sharara.

She said it would be worn during Islamic holidays, such as Bakra Eid or Ramadan, for birthdays or a sibling's wedding.

The outfit is very formal. She said it is like a skirt and is something usually older people would wear. The shirts are long enough to hide the top skirt and are long-sleeved because women in Pakistan are not allowed to show skin.

She said Pakistani and Indian fashions are becoming popular on Parisian runways.

"It is just becoming a big part of the American and European fashion, and we are being recognized now," Kazi said.

Life provides material for cartoonist pair

CORBIN CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

Chances are, you've never heard of Miah Whitaker or Becky Wilson. But you may have read their comic strip "Children of the Darned" on the Lifestyles page of the Collegian each day.

Whitaker, sophomore in English and media studies, and Wilson, sophomore in graphic design, are the minds behind the daily strip. Whitaker said the strip might be seen as unusual to some, but they didn't have to look far for inspiration.

"Our main inspiration for 'Children of the Darned' is life," said Whitaker, who writes the material for the strip. "Becky and I have some very weird friends. Just about everything that occurs in the cartoon has happened to us, or our friends, in real life."

Wilson, who draws the strip, said the two experience few obstacles when drawing their strips for the week.

"As you can probably tell, I don't put an overwhelming amount of effort into drawing the strip," Wilson said. "I'm happy as long as things are consistent. So, any ideas that would involve a complex picture are usually vetoed out of hand."

Whitaker, meanwhile, said she sees some difficulties in deciding what material to include or exclude from the strip.

"It's difficult trying to decide what parts of our lives to share and what to keep private," she said. Whitaker used the character Andy, based on one of her friends, as an example. "Andy's complete lack of a social life was pretty funny for a while, but we had to stop before it got too depressing."

Wilson said her hopes for the cartoon are simple. "I'd just like the strip to be something for readers to look at in class before moving on to the crossword puzzle," she said. "In that, I think we've succeeded."

STUCK MOJO

Band revitalizes rap-metal traditions

Music Review

Stuck Mojo
"Rising"

PHIL KELLUM
Kansas State Collegian

Run DMC and Aerosmith.

Anthrax and Public Enemy.

Those four bands tried mixing rock or metal with rap and achieved moderate success.

Atlanta's Stuck Mojo is more than an average metal band combining heavy music with rapping. These four guys know how to make one hell of a racket.

"Rising" is its newest album on Century Media Records and is its third total. This is going to be the album that makes it huge.

It's heavy, but still catchy.

The band has been gaining a bit of publicity, because the video for the title track features several World Championship Wrestling pro wrestlers and has been shown on TBS and TNT's WCW shows. More on that later.

The album kicks off with "Crooked Figurehead," a crushing song with anti-Clinton lyrics. It's a powerful thrash song that rolls along with the speed and force of a locomotive crushing all in its way.

Vocalist Bonz spits out some pretty venomous lyrics, too.

"Trick" is another heavy, more mid-tempo track that has a nice groove going on amongst the heaviness. Drummer Bud Fontsere's fills are amazing.

Stuck Mojo has always been anti-rock star, and "Assassination of a Pop Star" is another chapter in that saga. The lyrics illustrate a fantasy about killing an unnamed rock star. With its almost industrial-sounding intro slamming into some vicious power metal, this one's a winner.

The title track, "Rising," is probably my favorite song of the album. It's insanely catchy and features guitarist Rich Ward throwing down some great riffs. The breakdowns and chorus with bassist Corey Lowery singing are cool.

"Southern Pride" has to be the biggest departure for Mojo on this album. It boogies along like a demented Lynyrd Skynyrd song and is incredibly catchy too, all the while boasting about how much it loves the South. There's a Hammond organ and harmonica in there, too. A gospel choir shows up to sing the chorus. Incredibly cool stuff.

The next song, "Enemy Territory," sounds like it could have been on Mojo's last album, "Pigwalk." It's a thick, heavy song that hits hard and often.

I don't agree with the pro-death penalty message contained in "Throw The Switch," but it's a punishing song I always end up cranking up and screaming along to the chorus. Fontsere's drumming is so precise it sounds like a drum machine.

Bonz continues with the political lyrics on "Pipebomb," where he attacks the issue of militias and domestic terrorism. The best lyric I think has to be, "Fear breeds ignorance and then hate." I couldn't have said it better myself.

The album is capped off with a song that surprised me quite a bit. "Suburban Ranger" isn't a crushing metal song, but rather a pretty cool rap track. The vocals are handled by Bonz and what seems to be some local Atlanta rappers. It's all about gangster wannabes, and Bonz sentences them to 100 years of watching "The Andy Griffith Show," "Hee Haw" and "The Lawrence Welk Show."

The video for "Rising" is included on the compact disc to be played on your CD-ROM drive. It features WCW wrestlers Diamond Dallas Page and Raven's Flock kicking ass and taking names while Mojo rules inside a wrestling ring. It has to be seen to be believed.

All in all, "Rising" kicks some serious butt. If you buy one metal album this year, do yourself a favor and buy this one. This rules.

Sinn Fein leader urges support of Northern Ireland agreement

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CARRICKMORE, Northern Ireland — Seeing difficult times ahead, Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams appealed to thousands of IRA supporters Sunday to accept Northern Ireland's compromise peace accord.

Adams' party, an ally of the Irish Republican Army, scheduled commemorations in both parts of Ireland honoring the executed commanders of the 1916 Easter rebellion against British rule in Dublin.

Sinn Fein's support is key to the success of the historic, 67-page peace settlement reached Friday among negotiators from eight parties in the British-ruled province.

In his first public engagement since the agreement, Adams traveled to one of the north's hotbeds of IRA support, the village of Carrickmore, where hail fell between sunbursts and a British army helicopter hovered overhead.

A half-dozen bands of young men and women marched through the village wearing black berets and Easter lilies, playing traditional anti-British tunes on fife, and chanting "I! I! I-R-A."

In a half-hour speech, Adams said his negotiators had gotten all they could, and that in the talks' final hours Prime Minister Tony Blair had pushed the Ulster Unionist Party — which represents much of the north's pro-British Protestant majority — much farther than the UUP wanted to go.

The deal will create a new Northern Ireland Assembly and establish a formal link between Northern Ireland and the rest of Ireland — but it still keeps the north firmly tied to Britain.

When asked what they thought of Friday's accord, many people lining the street in Carrickmore said they found little to suggest the north would ever be united with the rest of Ireland. Many thought it looked like an honorable retreat for the Catholic side.

"This agreement isn't worth the paper it was put on. It'll never work," said Dessie McGraw, a mechanic from the nearby town of Omagh.

He gestured to the vast army and police barracks on the edge of Carrickmore and the old bullet holes that speckle its high protective walls of corrugated iron.

"I'd say them holes won't be the last," he said, suggesting the IRA's July 1997 truce wouldn't stand the test of time.

In the agreement, the British government pledged to reduce the numbers and role of the armed forces deployed in Northern Ireland to levels compatible with a peaceful society.

But it offered no specifics, tying any withdrawal of troops to the level of threat remaining from the north's myriad paramilitary groups.

"Getting the prisoners home would be the main good thing I see" in the accord, said Sean Teague, a construction worker from the village of Greencastle, referring to the promise to free imprisoned IRA and pro-British Protestant militants within two years if their cease-fires succeed.

"Sure that's better than nothing," he said, but "the other side must know we're just going to keep pushing for more."

Standing before a memorial to the 58 IRA men and women of surrounding County Tyrone killed since 1969, Adams said their sacrifices hadn't been in vain — and that Sinn Fein hadn't yet accepted every paragraph in the accord.

Although negotiators from the eight parties reached agreement, no party was required to sign the accord and acceptance by the parties as a whole is not a foregone conclusion.

David Trimble, leader of the key Protestant party, the Ulster Unionists, is still trying to sell the accord to his party members. He outmaneuvered rebels within his ranks Saturday, winning support of the executive committee, but still has to win over the rank and file.

Adams said the accord's provisions to create a reformed government for Northern Ireland that would be required to cooperate formally with Ireland had advanced the goal of a free and independent Ireland.

The accord, which must be approved in public referendums on May 22 in both parts of Ireland, asks voters in the Irish Republic to drop the country's constitutional claim to Northern Ireland.

Adams said Sinn Fein would oppose this part. Northern Ireland's six counties, he said, are Irish counties.

"THIS AGREEMENT ISN'T WORTH THE PAPER IT WAS PUT ON. IT'LL NEVER WORK."

DESSIE MCGRAW, A MECHANIC FROM OMAGH, NORTHERN IRELAND

Residents of Northern Ireland skeptical about future of country

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BELFAST, Northern Ireland — On an Easter of hope after 30 years of bloodshed in Northern Ireland, the Rev. Jack Shearer urged worshipers at a Protestant church Sunday to pray a historic agreement can bring lasting peace.

"The best way to get rid of an enemy is to turn him into a friend," Shearer said to 300 parishioners at St. Anne's Anglican Cathedral, where he is dean. "We pray for an end to bitterness, for the healing of wounds."

Outside the Belfast church, that Easter spirit of reconciliation was missing among those who feel betrayed by the deal reached Friday. The agreement will establish a formal link between Northern Ireland and the rest of Ireland but still keep the province firmly tied to Britain.

"Gerry Adams said before the peace talks began that he would settle for nothing less than a united Ireland, but he has settled for a lot less and I am angry," said Angie McCoubrey, a longtime supporter of Adams' IRA-allied Sinn Fein party. She recently defected to an extremist party linked with the militant Irish National Liberation Army.

The INLA has declared no cease-fire — unlike the Irish Republican Army.

"It is a sellout," said McCoubrey, who was preparing to join a Irish Republican Socialist Party march honoring those Catholics who died fighting to end British rule in the province. She was talking inside the party's heavily fortified headquarters, where windows are protected by wire mesh and a closed-circuit TV monitors all arrivals.

"We Will Not Renegotiate the Union" and "Brits Out" reads a placard above the entrance.

The agreement must be approved in public referendums on May 22 in both parts of Ireland. Copies of it are being delivered to every home in Northern Ireland.

"I want to read it for myself — so much has been written in the papers that I'm confused," said Seamus Wilson, a Catholic, while selling newspapers outside Belfast's red brick Opera House.

Archbishop Robin Eames, of the Anglican Church of Ireland, said he hoped people would listen carefully to all the arguments before making up their minds. "There is no way we can allow Northern Ireland go back into the darkness."

Everywhere, caution was the watchword.

"Trying problems still face the nation," the Rev. Sean Crummey said to 200 people who turned out in freezing weather for early Mass at St. Peter's Church.

"There are still a lot of extremists around," said Stuart McMurray, honorary secretary of the First Presbyterian Church in central Belfast, which has been damaged several times when the IRA bombed buildings nearby.

Many newspapers featured a Protestant baby born in the town of Lisburn hours after Friday's deal. She was named Kerrie Hope Sara Patterson, in the hope of a lasting peace.

Clinton administration vows to combat tobacco industry

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Brushing off an industry boycott and threats of lawsuits, both Clinton administration officials and members of Congress said they are confident they'll pass tough anti-tobacco legislation by the end of this year.

"We will get bipartisan legislation this year," Health and Human Services Secretary Donna Shalala said Sunday. "There's no question about it because it's about public health."

Leading tobacco companies last week announced they would not go along with tobacco legislation being debated in Congress, saying the original goal of reducing teen smoking had been subverted into a money grab that would drive the industry into bankruptcy.

Industry leaders said Sunday they would unleash their huge lobbying power to stop the legislation and would go to court to challenge provisions that limit advertising of tobacco products and require companies to pay billions in penalties if teen smoking reduction goals aren't met.

"The first thing we would do, if the present legislation passes, is go to court and have it declared unconstitutional," tobacco industry attorney J. Philip Carlton said on "Fox News Sunday."

Carlton and other industry spokesmen raised the specter of organized crime and drug dealers running black market sales to teen-agers if Congress forces cigarette prices up and the possibility that the industry would move jobs overseas. "You're talking about approximately 2 million American jobs," Carlton said.

But backers of legislation said they won't be deterred by the industry's withdrawal. "We think they should come back, but no one is going to beg them," White House budget chief Franklin Raines said on ABC's "This Week with Sam Donaldson and Cokie Roberts." "Their position has lost its political support."

"I'm optimistic that we can get this done by this summer," Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said on CBS' "Face the Nation."

The industry walkout came after McCain's Commerce Committee, by a 19-1 vote, approved a bill that would be much tougher on tobacco companies than the $368 billion accord reached with state attorneys general and health advocates last year.

The McCain legislation, which has been praised by the administration, would require the industry to pay $516 billion over 25 years for antismoking programs, would increase the cost of a pack of cigarettes by $1.10, would set a $6.5 billion annual liability cap but offer no immunity from future suits and would levy an annual $3.5 billion industry penalty if teen smoking goals are not met.

The House has moved slower on the issue, but Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., a leading advocate of tough antismoking measures, said he expects a strong bill because Republicans, long recipients of big contributions from the tobacco industry, don't want to appear pro-tobacco in an election year.

"I don't think they want that around their necks," he said on NBC's "Meet the Press." "Ultimately, we are going to work in a bipartisan basis and get strong legislation, and I don't think the tobacco companies are going to like it."

Steven Parrish, senior vice president of Philip Morris, said on NBC that if President Clinton asked tobacco companies to attend a summit aimed at reaching a deal, "obviously you would have to come." But, he said, "I wonder if it is not too late for that."

Shalala, also on NBC, said that with the administration and Congress now working well together on the issue, "at this point we don't need a summit."

With a consensus that some legislation will pass this year, officials argued over how to spend the estimated $65 billion in extra revenues over five years.

The administration already has targeted the money for health research, aid to tobacco farmers, and education and child care programs. Sen. Phil Gramm, R-Texas, appearing on CNN's "Late Edition," said it should go to making Medicare solvent.

House Budget Committee Chairman John Kasich, R-Ohio, on NBC, said House Republicans were committed to using any settlement money for tax relief.

Teen crime, gang involvement increases since 1989 national report on violence

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Nearly twice as many teen-agers reported gangs in their schools in 1995 as they did in 1989, while the number of students victimized by violent crime increased nearly 25 percent, the U.S. government reported Sunday.

President Clinton called the findings unacceptable and urged Congress to fight the trend by approving anti-gang and youth violence initiatives he offered a year ago, focusing on tough, targeted deterrence.

"Gangs — and the guns, drugs and violence that go with them — must be stopped from ever reaching the schoolhouse door," Clinton said.

Based on surveys of students aged 12-19, street gangs were spotted in schools by 28.4 percent of those questioned in 1995, compared with only 15.3 percent in 1989, the Bureau of Justice Statistics and the National Center for Education Statistics said.

Violent crime at school — physical attacks or a robbery by force, weapon or threat — was reported by 4.2 percent of students in 1995, up 23.5 percent from 3.4 percent six years earlier, the Justice and Education departments said.

Pascal D. Forgione Jr., U.S. Commissioner of Education Statistics, said that while relatively small, the 0.8 percentage point difference was statistically significant and represented an increase of about 270,000 students.

Forgione said the gang increase came in every type of community. In central cities, students reporting street gangs rose from 24.8 percent to 40.7 percent; in suburbs, from 14.0 percent to 26.3 percent, and in non-metropolitan areas, from 7.8 percent to 19.9 percent.

Violence at school shocked the nation last month when two boys, aged 11 and 13, gunned down four students and a teacher at a rural middle school in Jonesboro, Ark. Classmate Melinda Henson said 13-year-old Mitchell Johnson claimed to be part of a gang and wore some type of red "every day, because he was in the Blood Gang."

The survey found gangs and violence went together. In 1995, 7.5 percent of all students who reported gangs in their schools also said they had fallen victim to violent crime there, compared to just 2.7 percent of the students who reported no gangs in school.

Although citing changes in the six years between the two surveys, the report warned the "reader should not assume ... a stable trend between 1989 and 1995."

Indeed, government data shows violent crime by juveniles peaked in 1994 and has declined for two years since then.

Arrests of teenagers for violent crimes dropped 2.9 percent in 1995 and 9.2 percent in 1996.

WEST SIDE STORY

JEFF COOPER/Collegian

TOM PHILLIPS, CHAIRMAN OF THE MANHATTAN URBAN AREA PLANNING BOARD, STANDS ON HIS BACK DECK ON THE WEST SIDE OF MANHATTAN, WHICH OVERLOOKS THE WEST-SIDE DEVELOPMENT.

▶ MANHATTAN'S WEST SIDE LOOKS FOR IDENTITY DURING EXPANSION.

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Editor's Note: This is the first in a series of stories focusing on Manhattan's development. Wednesday's story will explore various efforts for downtown development.

For Tom Phillips, moving his family to the west side of Manhattan meant a new house, great views of the city and plenty of open land for building.

But it also meant giving up the conveniences of living in the tighter urban fabric of the conventional city — walking to Aggieville and K-State, living closer to the east-side shopping outlets, and neighborhoods with "vitality," as Phillips puts it.

"There's a trade-off," he said.

While searching for an old home to buy and restore, Phillips and his family rented a home for two years in an old neighborhood just south of K-State.

"Our goal was to find a nice, old home and restore it, but we were unable to find the type of home we had our hearts set on," he said.

Phillips received a master's degree from K-State in regional and community planning, worked as a city planner for Lenexa, Kan., and now serves as the chairman of the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board.

It might be a coincidence that Phillips is a significant voice in Manhattan community planning, but his family's story of finding a place to live is representative of a larger shift in Manhattan's history — a shift to the west side.

With last year's announcement of plans to add hundreds of upscale homes with the Colbert Hills golf course development in northwest Manhattan, the city has made a commitment to its west side. The majority of new houses built in the city are in this zone, which was identified by the 1991 Comprehensive Plan for Manhattan as the direction for the bulk of new residential development.

But as Manhattan begins to take on two distinct American urban forms — tight-knit city and rambling sprawl — how are planners responding to the changing nature of the city? Members of the planning board, who are appointed by both the city and county, and the elected members of the Manhattan City Commission ultimately sign off on planning matters, be it zoning issues, significant development site plans or services, such as water and sewage.

The city's representative planners, those who directly respond to the interests of residents, have a variety of views for a future Manhattan.

A new kind of city for new attitudes

Critics of urban culture often point to the way changes in how we live contribute to the way cities are built. New technology has altered how people work and live — even in a small Midwestern city such as Manhattan.

Robert Page, professor of landscape architecture and regional and community planning, said the west side ranks as typical suburbia — akin to new development in Johnson County.

Page, who lives in a west-side apartment, said he thinks the sprawl west is owed to car-culture baby boomers who drive everywhere.

"Since we are conditioned to driving, we can afford to live further from where we work, play and study," Page said. "With new communications what they are, we are also no longer limited by geographic location."

It helps to remember the traditional core of Manhattan was developed when horses were the main mode of transportation and a trolley connected downtown to Aggieville. More people walked.

The street grid of the historic city was developed easily because it sits on flat land. The west side's topography of rolling hills significantly constrains development.

Planning for Growth

Jerry Reynard, a member of the planning board for the past three years, said he would like to see the west side take on more attributes of the older city.

Referring to the way different subdivisions sometimes don't have connecting streets or much pedestrian access, Reynard said, "We are developing pockets where you are more or less bounded by development."

Lacking a focus?

Many development advocates say the west side lacks the identity of a city — the public places and civic landmarks that make a place what it is. That area of Manhattan is often compared to Johnson County, which has become a typical American suburb — faceless and sprawling, miles of similar subdivisions and commercial strips with no focus.

Some argue that unifying elements, such as a central commercial development or a community center, could improve the west side's cohesiveness as a distinct area of town.

"The more unifying elements that could be created on the west side the better," said Brent Bowman, principal architect with Brent Bowman and Associates and a considerable voice in local building issues.

Bowman said he thinks architecture could go a long way in giving the west side a focus.

"I would like to find some oases of varying densities among the hills of residential rooftops," Bowman said, suggesting that rowhouses could be an alternative to single-family homes on large lots. He said most unconventional development depends on finding a developer willing to take a risk.

Bowman said he thinks the Colbert Hills residential development could provide a landmark for the west side. But some planners said they fear a commercial development with Colbert Hills would draw focus away from downtown. Some even express fear that another mall could be built on the west side in

2 hotels prepare for grand openings; another to open by football season

ANDREW WIMMER
Kansas State Collegian

Construction is winding down on two new hotels set to open this spring in Manhattan, adding at least 170 rooms by summer.

A third hotel could be open by fall.

The Hampton Inn is on Kansas Highway 24 east of Manhattan Town Center. General Manager Robin Smith said May 1 will be the grand opening.

"We had planned to be open sooner, but weather caused delays," she said.

"We poured concrete for the parking lot last week, and that is the last bit of construction before we are ready to open. We are putting the final touches on each room and getting together a great staff."

Smith said the Hampton Inn has hired 23 Manhattan residents to staff the 72-room hotel. The hotel has an indoor swimming pool, whirlpool, exercise room and offers a free deluxe continental breakfast for its customers.

"We are excited about being in Manhattan," Smith said.

"We are already booked for graduation and are close to being full for football weekends in the fall."

Fairfield Inn has set June 8 as its goal to open its location southwest of Manhattan Town Center on Houston Street. General Manager Brad Everett said the weather has delayed construction of the hotel.

▶ What on the horizon?
Manhattan could have three new hotels by football season's beginning. In construction is a Hampton Inn, Fairfield Inn and a Comfort Inn.

"The March snow storm really put us back as far as construction," he said. "We went a long time without a roof, but we put the finishing touches on it last week.

"June 8 is a realistic goal for completion, but if we have any more bad weather, we will have to push that back a couple of days," Everett said.

The Fairfield Inn, which is part of the Marriott Hotel group, will have 98 rooms and employ 20-25 area residents. Several rooms will have a hot tub.

The inn also will offer an indoor swimming pool, workout area and a meeting room that can accommodate up to 30 people.

"Manhattan is growing," Everett said.

"The city is becoming more attractive and more aggressive in bringing conventions into town."

Everett said the rise of the K-State sports program also brings a lot of overnight visitors to Manhattan.

A third hotel is expected to open before next fall.

A Comfort Inn is being constructed east of Manhattan on Highway 24. Alli Baker, public relations director for Choice Hotels International, the corporate owner of the franchise, said her company looks at a new site's demographics before it goes ahead with construction. There are 1,636 Comfort Inns worldwide.

"We look at all aspects of a community," she said. "Manhattan is in need of more hotel rooms for visitors and travelers, and we see a great profit potential in the area."

No opening date was available for the Comfort Inn, and Baker said she didn't know how many rooms the hotel will have.

Student, faculty donors needed for campus bone-marrow drive

▶ NATIONAL REGISTRATION PAID THROUGH MEMORIAL FUND.

KELLY REDDING
Kansas State Collegian

The KSU Alumni Association and the Student Alumni Board are sponsoring a bone-marrow donor drive to match up people who need marrow with those who are willing to donate it.

"Sixty percent of the people who need bone-marrow transplants can't find a donor just within the family," said Heather Lansdowne, adviser to the Student Alumni Board.

"That's why we need to get more people into the donor registry."

Lansdowne said the procedure to become a donor is quite simple.

"All we are going to do is show a video, take a small sample of blood and have the students fill out some paperwork regarding their general health," she said.

After the blood sample is taken, the information will be sent to a national registry of donors.

"We need to find students who are going to be open to something bigger down the road," she said.

"If a student matches up with someone who needs a bone marrow transplant, they will have to spend some time in the hospital for the procedure."

▶ More info?
The drive is from noon to 6 p.m. today and 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Wednesday in the K-State Student Union rooms K, S and U.

Lansdowne said at least one former K-State student has become a bone-marrow donor.

"We did have a student who went through the bone-marrow donor drive and became a donor," she said.

"She ended up saving someone's life."

Lansdowne also said normally people have to pay a fee to have their name and information added to the national registry of donors.

"People who want to be listed in the donor registry will not have to pay a fee at K-State," she said.

"We are paying the fee for them through a memorial fund that a family set up for an alumni who died waiting for a matching donor."

Clintons pay $91,964 for federal taxes; revenue from book donated to charity

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton paid $91,964 in federal income taxes in 1997, with royalties from Hillary Clinton's book and income from investments outstripping the president's salary.

They reported $569,511 in adjusted gross income, of which $200,000 was the president's salary. They also reported income of $281,898, including royalties from "It Takes A Village," Hillary Clinton's book, as well as earnings from investments and a refund from his Arkansas state taxes.

The first family made charitable donations totaling $270,725, which were primarily derived from proceeds of Hillary Clinton's book. All income from the book is being donated to charity.

Vice President Al Gore and Tipper Gore released their tax returns, showing earnings of $197,729 and federal taxes of $47,662.

In 1996, the Clintons tax returns revealed they were millionaires for the first time — on paper, at least. They reported $1,065,101 in adjusted gross income, of which $200,000 was the president's salary. They paid $199,791 in federal income taxes.

Secretary of State Albright asks to block Virginia execution of Paraguay citizen

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Secretary of State Madeleine Albright asked Virginia's governor to block today's execution of a death-row inmate from Paraguay, saying she was concerned about the potential harm to Americans abroad.

Albright made the request "with great reluctance" Monday in a letter to Gov. James Gilmore. A spokesman, Mark Miner, said the governor was reviewing Albright's request but would wait to see how the Supreme Court rules in the case.

The Justice Department urged the Supreme Court to allow the execution of Angel Francisco Breard to proceed, despite pleas for a postponement by the government of Paraguay and the World Court.

The high-level split between two federal agencies on whether to stay the execution was outlined in the Justice Department's brief to the Supreme Court and was confirmed by State Department officials.

Albright, in her letter to Gilmore, fully endorsed the U.S. position before the World Court but said she had the responsibility to bear in mind the safety of Americans overseas.

"I am particularly concerned about the possible negative consequences for the many U.S. citizens who live and travel abroad," Albright wrote. The immediate execution of Breard could be seen as a denial by the United States of international law and the World Court, she said.

The Justice Department, in its brief, noted Albright's request to the governor as a proper exercise of persuasion in a case where a World Court order does not provide a basis for U.S. courts to act.

Breard, a citizen of Paraguay, was convicted of the 1992 stabbing death of Ruth Dickie in her Arlington, Va., apartment.

The World Court said Breard's case violated a treaty with Paraguay because that country's consulate was not notified. While acknowledging Breard was not allowed to meet with someone from the consulate, the Justice filing contends "there is no basis for concluding that the assistance of a consular officer would have changed the outcome of the criminal proceedings."

The 52-page brief was filed just before the late-afternoon deadline set by the court.

The government of Paraguay and Breard asked the Supreme Court to order his execution postponed until formal appeals they filed can be considered and acted upon.

The court was not expected to rule on those emergency requests until today.

Refinery expansion plans well known, says retired executive of Koch Industries

TOPEKA — Former stockholders of Koch Industries were told repeatedly of plans to expand a Minnesota oil refinery, a retired executive told jurors in federal court Monday.

The question of what the former stockholders knew about the expansion plan before they sold their stock is a key issue in a federal lawsuit. The former stockholders sued the company over the 1983 sale, claiming they were misled about the value of their stock because the refinery was undervalued.

Bernard Paulson's testimony began the second week of the trial of the lawsuit in U.S. District Court.

It pits four multimillionaire Koch brothers against each other. Koch Industries, founded by their father, is the nation's second-largest privately owned corporation. More than $1 billion could be at stake.

Paulson was manager of the company's Pine Bend refinery in Rosemount, Minn., and later its vice president for manufacturing. He retired from Koch Industries in 1988 but remains a part-time consultant.

Attorneys for the former stockholders put Paulson on the stand as a hostile witness. They wanted to show that crucial information about the refinery did not go to the stockholders who were preparing to sell their shares in the company.

But repeatedly, Paulson said all stockholders had known of plans to expand the Pine Bend refinery since 1976 — seven years before the minority stockholders sold their interests in Koch Industries.

He also said Bill Koch, the leader of selling stockholders, expressed an interest in the Pine Bend expansion. In evidence at trial is an October 1980 phone message slip, in which Bill Koch called Paulson for information.

Bill Koch, at 57 the youngest brother by minutes, and Frederick Koch, 64, the oldest brother, led other former stockholders in filing the lawsuit.

The defendants are Koch Industries and former and current company officers. They include Charles Koch, 62, picked by his father to run the company, and David Koch, 57, Bill Koch's older twin.

The former stockholders, led by Bill Koch, contend the company and its officials withheld information before the sale.

The defendants contend the former stockholders — who received $1.1 billion from the 1983 sale — received a fair price and have chosen to wage a legal vendetta.

TEACHING the TANGO

UPC offers couples, singles lessons in ballroom dancing

ALECIA TERRELL
Kansas State Collegian

The letters "T-A-N-G-O" could be heard over and over between dance partners last night as couples concentrated on learning new steps. Words such as "promenade," "throw" and "lunge" were used repeatedly to explain some of the moves.

The tango lessons, which started April 5, are offered through Union Program Council and will continue to be taught in Union Station through May 3. The 30 couples and singles participating in the class, which is taught by Mike Bennett and two others, were required to pay a small entry fee to attend.

The dancers had only learned the basic moves of the tango at the first lesson. At their second session of four lessons, couples began to memorize the dance, starting from the basic steps and adding the new variations.

"Mike is really good at breaking down the steps so that we can understand him," Bryan Wagner, junior in pre-law, said.

Wagner said he heard about the lessons when they were offered last year and thought they sounded fun.

Jay Witt, senior in economics and political science, and his partner, Kelly Miller, freshman in animal science and pre-vet, said they actually have practiced some of the dances at Longhorn's in Aggieville.

"We took swing lessons last semester in the ballroom and thought we'd try the tango, too," Witt said.

Bennett, architectural adviser and dance instructor of the class, said it is tough to articulate how to teach the dance moves.

"I think people tend to take the teaching part for granted," Bennett said. "When people try to reiterate steps to me they say, 'So you step here and turn here?' It's just not an easy thing to explain to people."

Bennett said when friends asked him to teach the lessons, he found he knew his part well but didn't know the woman's part.

"I really had to think about it," he said. "When I started teaching, I finally got a partner in the dance department, and she helped me quite a bit."

Bennett said he has been teaching dancing lessons for 11 years.

"I grew up with this kind of stuff because my parents did it, and I saw it in the house all the time," Bennett said. "When I was a kid, we had formal lessons in about the 5th and 6th grades. On Friday nights, we would all dress up in our little suits and dresses."

Bennett teaches a variety of dances, including the fox trot, cha-cha, samba, swing and jitterbug.

"People don't realize that these dances are considered ballroom dancing," Saunders said. "There are actually two types of ballroom dancing. Smooth dancing includes dances like the tango, waltz and fox trot. The other type of ballroom dancing is rhythm, which includes dances like the jitterbug, cha-cha and the samba. Most people picture ballroom dancing as a very formal type of dancing, when actually, all of these are ballroom dances."

Bennett said the classes can be taken now through the dance department, and students can earn one credit hour for the class.

"I'd really like to see the cha-cha taught," he said. "It's a very rhythmic and seductive dance. You really can't miss the beat. It's a Latin dance that really gives you a sense of romance. I think people would really enjoy this dance."

Bennett said that before teaching, they like to put scenarios in the dancer's minds to have them visualize a romantic partner or situation.

"People really get into the dances when they have certain pictures in their minds," he said.

"By the end of the night, people start to get a little frisky."

Cooperation, common sense needed on crosswalks

This warm, summer-like weather means more students walking, jogging, in-line skating and biking on campus.

It also means more students walking in the crosswalks.

Thankfully, improvements to three crosswalks on Denison Avenue, originally scheduled for 1999, will take place this summer. The priority was made after Mindy Hines, freshman in musical theater, was struck by a car while crossing Denison in March.

Unfortunately, other crosswalk upgrades won't take place until 1999, although the City/University Tax Fund has decided to allocate about $120,000 for the work.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said in an interview with the Collegian that the campus does not have a problem with crosswalk safety and the measures taken by the university are proactive.

Increased lighting at the crosswalks will help, especially in early evenings, when most near-accidents occur.

The campus has decided to respond well to the problems in the area where the March accident happened. However, the lighting improvements are just one step in solving this continuing problem.

Students need to take an active role in eradicating near-accidents. Those living in the residence halls and on the periphery of the campus should remember the solid parental advice of looking both ways before crossing the street.

Joggers and bicyclists can improve their safety by anticipating the decisions of drivers or traffic, but it's best to allow for more space and wait until the path is clear of vehicles.

Bicyclists also can increase their safety by staying within the bike paths, obeying the signs and signaling on turns. Pedestrians should stay out of campus bike paths and cross only at the designated areas.

Drivers have a huge responsibility in increasing safety because in any collision, vehicle weight and size are in their favor. Drivers should become increasingly alert of pedestrians and slow down around campus. By acting defensively, everyone gains.

MAN, THIS WEATHER BLOWS

It's tornado season again, but when isn't it?

Immediately after a literature class many Decembers ago, one of my classmates was ecstatic to see snow drifting from the skies. Now, I like a good flurry as much as the next guy, but she was completely wigging out. I asked her why, and she explained breathlessly, "I've never seen snow before."

I take Kansas' meteorological schizophrenia for granted. I'm used to getting everything from blizzards to thunderstorms to the inevitable, eventual hurricane in the time that it takes to microwave a burrito. But not everybody is ready for nature's full force, and we were reminded of that last week in the southern section of the United States.

Don't think it can't happen here, either. Just drive out past Keats, Kan., a little ways, and you'll see what's left of a grain silo that used to sport a bright, shiny Riley County Falcons sign before the summer of 1993.

It was that same summer I came barreling home from Lincoln, Neb., listening to tapes, and only clicked on my local radio station when I saw its van parked nearby. The first thing I heard was "And we are watching the tornado go back into the clouds ..."

Disclaimer: Never, ever do this.

Somewhere between the overpass on Seth Childs Road and Kimball Avenue (where my car was) and the Farm Bureau building hovered a funnel cloud, looking for a place to plop back down and toss around real estate like a crisp salad.

I remembered how my mother, who had been required to attend severe-weather-spotting classes, had taken me along before I turned 10 in the hopes that when that fateful day came and I was placed in a life-or-death situation, I would put into practice the training she'd imparted onto me.

So I hopped back into the car and drove away really quickly. Again, don't do this.

VIEWPOINT

KEN WELLS

I and Manhattan both lucked out back in 1993 (if we ignore the floods for now). It easily could have been much worse. And I take the severe-weather education I've received from all angles for granted. But if we can have students who have never seen snow, we can have students who don't know what to do when that siren goes off, and we need every second we can get in that case.

First of all, get the hell out of your car. Only bonehead columnists, death-wished reporters and actors drive around tornadoes. Maybe you can outrun a tornado, and maybe you can get picked up and bounced against the pavement or transplanted to somewhere in Ohio. Find a building or a ditch and cover your head.

If you're in a house with a basement, get in it. I hope you've thought ahead and already put a battery-operated radio in the basement for just such an occasion. Get away from windows, because debris is one of the tornado's most lethal elements.

Hide under some heavy furniture (in short, run the landlord drill). Southwest corners are, incidentally, no longer considered the best place to be — northerly in the basement appears safer. If you don't have a basement, find a closet or a centrally located room, again, away from windows. Walls are your friend.

If you're in a public place, generally, you'll be herded the appropriate direction. Then again, you just might end up following the people jockeying for a better spot from which to watch the storm. Again, the same rules apply: go interior, away from windows. Don't put much faith in wide-span roofs during tornadoes; find some more walls.

You've seen the signs from the intolerant cross-wielders in Topeka insisting "God hates fags." No, God really hates mobile homes. If you hear sirens, get as far away from a mobile home as you can, because they're never as mobile as when twisters pop into town.

I don't care how well you tie the thing down or how many Hummels you have in your new curio cabinet, bail out. The Hummels can take care of themselves. Don't even say "mobile home" during a downpour. There are several factors that contributed to the elevated death counts inSouthern tornadoes as opposed to those in the Midwest, and chief among them are the building differences; there are more mobile homes and houses without basements in the South.

Don't forget, either, that tornadoes are possible at any time of year. After the weather we've had, that should come as no surprise, but it bears reiteration.

If you're still uncertain, now's the time to ask. Just be prepared. When the wind shifts and you feel the cold, moist breeze cross your skin, turn on the radio, be ready, and please survive. I need all the readers I can get.

Uneducated few give snakes bad rap; they only bite as last line of defense

What are you afraid of? Death, the unknown, pain, bad grades, that roommate from your freshman year who liked to play the banjo in the nude? Whatever it is, we're all afraid of something. But some people let their fears control them and some people are afraid of silly things.

One of the biggest fears I saw firsthand during my days as a zoo volunteer was the rampant and ridiculous fear of snakes. The general attitude of which can be summed up by a quote from one of my professors who said, "All snakes kill in one of two ways. Some kill by poison, and the rest kill by heart attack."

The people who think this way are the ones who walk quite nervously through the herpetarium (reptile house) at the zoo. The worst of them refuse to come within 10 feet of the exhibit windows. That kind of behavior is obviously foolish — let's examine why. Does a snake have any hands or other appendages with which to strike the glass? No. Which leaves only its head. How many of you, without first downing a case of Southern Comfort, willingly would put your face through plate glass? The snake has no desire to do so, either.

In the Kansas wilderness, the big fear is the dreaded rattlesnake. Here is an animal that does everything in its power to let you know right where it is so you can avoid it. The rattling does not mean, "You want some of this? Let's go, cowboy!" By rattling, the snake is saying, "Hey! I'm down here, please don't hurt me! I was just leaving! You wouldn't hit a guy with glasses, would ya?"

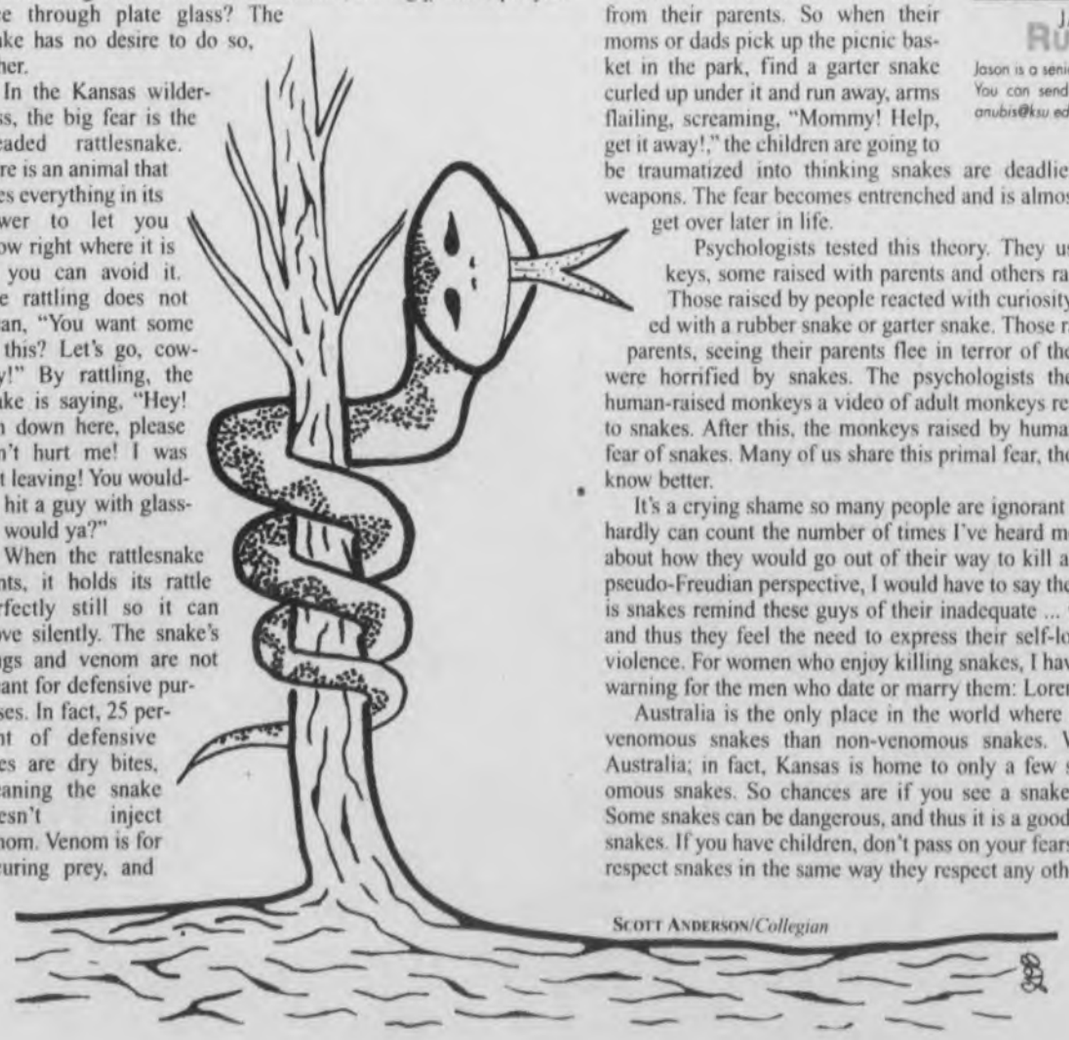
When the rattlesnake hunts, it holds its rattle perfectly still so it can move silently. The snake's fangs and venom are not meant for defensive purposes. In fact, 25 percent of defensive bites are dry bites, meaning the snake doesn't inject venom. Venom is for securing prey, and because you are a bit bigger than the average field mouse, the snake would be wasting his venom to use it on you.

I'm not saying snakes won't bite. They will give you every chance to leave them alone long enough for them to escape. But if you push them, they have no other choice (remember that lack of appendages thing we discussed earlier). They also may bite if you surprise them and are suddenly too close for them to have any time to warn you of their presence. I think you would react similarly if an animal 10 times your size suddenly stepped or sat on you.

People continue to demonize snakes, though. Of course, it wasn't the person's fault the rattlesnake bit them; after all, they were only trying to kick it out of the way. Worse than fearing them, people pass this unjustified fear on to their children.

VIEWPOINT

JASON RUCKER



Jason is a senior in animal science. You can send e-mail to Jason at anubis@ksu.edu.

Children learn about the world from their parents. So when their moms or dads pick up the picnic basket in the park, find a garter snake curled up under it and run away, arms flailing, screaming, "Mommy! Help, get it away!," the children are going to be traumatized into thinking snakes are deadlier than nuclear weapons. The fear becomes entrenched and is almost impossible to get over later in life.

Psychologists tested this theory. They used baby monkeys, some raised with parents and others raised by people. Those raised by people reacted with curiosity when presented with a rubber snake or garter snake. Those raised with their parents, seeing their parents flee in terror of the rubber snake, were horrified by snakes. The psychologists then showed the human-raised monkeys a video of adult monkeys reacting fearfully to snakes. After this, the monkeys raised by humans developed a fear of snakes. Many of us share this primal fear, though we should know better.

It's a crying shame so many people are ignorant about snakes. I hardly can count the number of times I've heard morons spout off about how they would go out of their way to kill a snake. From a pseudo-Freudian perspective, I would have to say the reason for this is snakes remind these guys of their inadequate ... well, manhood, and thus they feel the need to express their self-loathing through violence. For women who enjoy killing snakes, I have two words of warning for the men who date or marry them: Lorena Bobbit.

Australia is the only place in the world where there are more venomous snakes than non-venomous snakes. We are not in Australia; in fact, Kansas is home to only a few species of venomous snakes. So chances are if you see a snake, it's harmless. Some snakes can be dangerous, and thus it is a good idea to respect snakes. If you have children, don't pass on your fears; teach them to respect snakes in the same way they respect any other wild animal.

Athletic department alienates students with price increase

Editor,

I read the first article in the April 3 Collegian with great interest. I especially enjoyed one particular quote by Bob Cavello. He said "whether the referendum passed or failed, the ticket prices were going to go up." He goes on to say that the rise in ticket prices was not a "punishment for the students' decision not to support the stadium expansion."

Both these statements stink worse than mayo left out in the sun for a week. There were two possible proposals put before the student body. The Oct. 22, 1997, Collegian reported "under both proposals, ticket prices for students would be frozen for four years."

This begs a question: Did the athletic department lie to the student body last year when the referendum was presented to the students or is it lying now?

Either way, the point is insignificant. After all, if you can justify doubling the price of tickets over a three-year period and call it cost-of-business increases, you can justify anything in your own little world. Of course, the athletic department has several excuses ready to go for these outrageous increases. The need to cover the $147,215 cut from their budget earlier this year by the Student Senate is just one example. However, the $4 increase will generate more than double that if the students continue to buy at the rate they have in the past.

Another excuse is Title IX on gender equality. My question here is, why has it taken our athletic department 25-plus years to try and comply with this law?

But then again, what do we expect from the athletic department? After all, Max Urick, director of intercollegiate athletics, used a thinly veiled threat last year to get his stadium expansion passed. Fortunately, it backfired. Students had bought 9,500 tickets in the previous year and to hell with anyone who thought they could blackmail us into paying to keep that.

Time for a wakeup call. How long can the athletic department afford to alienate its students? Can K-State afford to have these clowns hang around any longer? And is there any way that Student Senate can make up for this price increase by lowering each student's fees to the athletic department by $28 per year? That will cover the $4 increase for each of the seven home games.

Ramirez should stop whining about racism, reader says

Editor,

I'm writing in response to a column by Santos Ramirez. In this and all of his columns, Ramirez does nothing but whine about how badly he and other Latinos get treated.

I am not saying biases and prejudice do not exist in America, but it is not the insurmountable obstacle as he suggests. My advice to Ramirez is this: Buck up, and bear it. Quit whining about how no one gives minorities any opportunities, and make some of your own. You cannot deny that in some ways there are actually MORE opportunities.

For example, there's no such thing as a "United White Kids College Fund," and I've never heard of a law protecting the jobs of the average white male as affirmative action does for minorities and women.

I know many people personally who are considered to be in a minority group who have made themselves quite successful. Not because there was no bias, but in spite of it. If you would put all the energy you spend feeling sorry for yourself into making your future what you want it to be, then I'm sure you could make yourself as successful as they have.

Students to be auctioned off for AIDS project fund-raiser

JOE HURLA
Kansas State Collegian

It has been said that money can't buy love, but that theory will be put to the test Saturday when a group of K-State students will be auctioned off to raise money for the Regional AIDS Project.

Bachelors and bachelorettes will be bid on from 8 to 9 p.m. at the VFW Post at 212 S. Fourth St. They will spend the rest of the evening with the bidder who is willing to pay the highest price for their companionship.

Although the auctionees will belong to the highest bidder, there will be limitations on what can take place once the purchases have been made.

"They are not to leave the building together," Kathy Battles, event coordinator, said. "They're just being bid on to dance with for the evening, nothing more."

The new couples will be able to dance together until the event's conclusion at about 1 a.m., unless someone else wants to cut in.

"If someone else wants to dance with one of the bachelors or bachelorettes, they'll be able to buy dances for a dollar apiece," Battles said.

More info?
Anyone interested in volunteering should contact Kathy Battles at 784-3152.

Besides these dollar dances and the auction itself, Battles said there will be a cash bar, raffles, door prizes and a local disc jockey.

She said she expects all of this will combine to raise a hefty sum for RAP.

"We are expecting to raise about $2,000. Of course, we're hoping to raise a lot more," Battles said.

All of the money raised through the night's events will be sent directly to RAP. Executive Director Eunice Dorst will then decide just how the money is to be spent.

"We have two main goals," Dorst said. "To assist people who are infected with HIV, and to educate people so that we can prevent the spread of the disease."

Before RAP will be able to raise this money, Battles said she still needs to work out a few more details.

"I still need to find some volunteers to be auctioned off," Battles said. "I'd like to find three more girls and six more guys, but if I can't, I'll just make do with what I've got."

Battles said because she recently has had several volunteers back out of their commitment because of other obligations, she isn't picky about whom she will accept as volunteers.

"They have to be 18, and we prefer that they not be married, because we don't want to have any jealous spouses running around. Other than that, we're pretty open," Battles said.

"THEY'RE JUST BEING BID ON TO DANCE WITH FOR THE EVENING, NOTHING MORE."

Members of track teams run away with gold medals at meet

After a week of spring football practice, Keith Black, who was third on the Wildcats' pre-spring depth chart at the short-side corner, did the obvious on Saturday — he went to a track meet.

Black, a sprinter on the K-State track team, captured the gold medal in the 400-meter dash at the K.T. Woodman Classic on Saturday in Wichita. Black's time, 48.85 seconds, was not fantastic for him — his career-best time is 45.42 — but K-State coach Cliff Rovelto said there are ample reasons for the slower time.

"He was pretty tired and sore, and with the 30-mile-per-hour winds it was virtually impossible to run a fast race, and I don't know that we expected him to — given the circumstances," Rovelto said.

Black went to track practice one time last week, and his attendance at track practice will be sporadic if not nonexistent throughout the rest of spring football practice, Rovelto said.

"That will probably be his last meet for a month," Rovelto said. "We're going to do the best we can," he said of Black practicing track. "I don't know what all that will entail."

Joining Black on the gold-medal list on the men's side were Gene Petersen, Nathan Leeper and John Martin.

Petersen won both the discus, with an NCAA provisionally qualifying throw of 180-9, and the shot put, with a toss of 52-9 1/4.

"I don't know that it's anything special right now for him, but it was his farthest throw of the season," Rovelto said of Petersen's discus performance.

Leeper took the gold in high jump with an NCAA provisionally qualifying leap of 7-1 3/4. Martin won the 200-meter dash with a time of 21.1.

Even with the first place finishes, the K-State men managed only second place with 134 points in the three-team meet. Kansas placed first with 142 points, while Wichita State finished third with 101 points.

"We had three or four guys, who are good guys, that weren't there for us," Rovelto said. "All in all, I don't think our men competed that well — compared to our women."

The K-State women ran away from the Jayhawks and Shockers with a team total of 164 points. Kansas finished with 135 points, and Wichita State finished with 100 points.

The Wildcats were led by Renetta Seiler, who continued her stellar season with a three-gold performance. Her throws of 178-11 in the discus and 195-6 in the hammer were both NCAA automatic-qualifying marks. She also captured the gold in the shot put with a toss of 46-8.

The women's team captured a multitude of gold medals in the track meet, but Rovelto said Rachel Woods had a particularly good meet.

"She's improved a lot in the 400, she's been really consistent, and she's played a critical role in the relays that we have run fast," Rovelto said.

The women's 1600-meter relay and 400-meter relay teams won with times of 3:52.9 and 47.22, respectively.

Yankee Stadium under repair after support beam crashes

NEW YORK — Part of the House that Ruth Built came crashing down Monday — just days before its 75th birthday.

A 500-pound support beam smashed into the Yankee Stadium stands Monday afternoon, forcing postponement of two games between the New York Yankees and Anaheim Angels and shifting a third game to Shea Stadium.

There were no fans inside the park — baseball's most storied landmark — when the beam fell an estimated 40 feet from the underside of the upper deck into the mezzanine section and landed on seats between third base and left field at about 2 p.m., city officials said.

More than 20,000 people had been expected at Monday night's game at the stadium, which turns 75 years old Saturday. Mayor Rudy Giuliani said someone almost certainly would have been killed if the collapse had happened during the game.

The beam — actually a 1-cubic-foot steel joint — crushed one of the blue plastic seats into pieces and gouged a 6-inch hole in the concrete. The beam tore another hole in the ceiling of the upper deck.

"Yankee Stadium is crumbling. ... Everybody is in a little disarray right now," pitcher David Cone said.

While night games Monday and today were postponed, the Yankees later announced they would play the Angels at 1 p.m. EDT on Wednesday at Shea Stadium, home of the rival New York Mets. The Mets also are scheduled to play at Shea that day, at 7:40 p.m. against the Chicago Cubs.

The earliest the Yankees can play in the stadium would be Friday night against the Detroit Tigers. If the stadium is not repaired by then, that series would be moved to Shea.

The Yankees played their entire home schedule at Shea Stadium in 1974 and 1975 while Yankee Stadium was being remodeled. The Yankees are scheduled to play the Mets on June 26-28 at Shea as part of interleague play.

Stadium superintendent Bob Wilkinson said the ballpark is inspected once a year. He said crews would work through the night Monday to check every nook and cranny.

"There is a lot of foundation work and steel still here from 1923," he said. "But this stadium is in good shape. This is an isolated incident."

Cats to fight Tigers in hopes of ending slump

JEREMY KELLEY
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State baseball team is in a funk.

Five straight losses will do that to a team.

But the Cats aren't playing any pushover teams. Of K-State's 19 losses, 12 have come via ranked opponents.

"Hopefully that will prepare us for the battles ahead, even if you take a hard knock here or there," K-State assistant coach Mike Hensley said. "If we can weather the storm and get back up off the canvas, then we will have a shot."

The Cats are coming off a three-game sweep to No. 10 Oklahoma, a series in which the Cats were outscored 43-10.

"We didn't do anything right," Yancy Ayres said. "They put the pressure on us and we folded."

Discouragement seems to be the universal attitude of the team after suffering the worst series defeat ever under head coach Mike Clark.

"I would say that is the universal attitude," Hensley said. "But we created our own downfall. They did a good job of capitalizing on our mistakes. Any time the wounded duck flew in, they jumped all over it. They did that all weekend long."

Hensley said the team used its off-day on Monday to regroup and refocus on its season.

"We sit down and we look at what positives we can take out of the weekend," he said.

"We won't forget about the negative, because without the negatives the positives wouldn't be so sweet."

Last year at this time, the Cats were in the midst of a 13-game losing streak — one that would eventually oust them from the Big 12 Conference Tournament.

Hensley said the coaching staff is fully aware of that and is doing certain things to make sure that doesn't happen this season.

"We have to be positive with the kids," Hensley said. "The thing we are going to try and stress is winning each inning, not winning the game. We have to be patient and we'll be ok if we just stay positive."

However, this year is a new story.

The Cats are 5-11 in the Big 12 amidst what Hensley called the bulk of the teams in the conference.

"They know they're right in the thick of things, and the kids know they're in a funk on the road," Hensley said. "We've brow-beat them and built them back up, and they know they need to turn things around."

The top-six finishers in the conference go to the Big 12 Tournament on May 14-17 in Oklahoma City.

K-State sits at eighth place in the conference, in front of Iowa State, Texas and Nebraska.

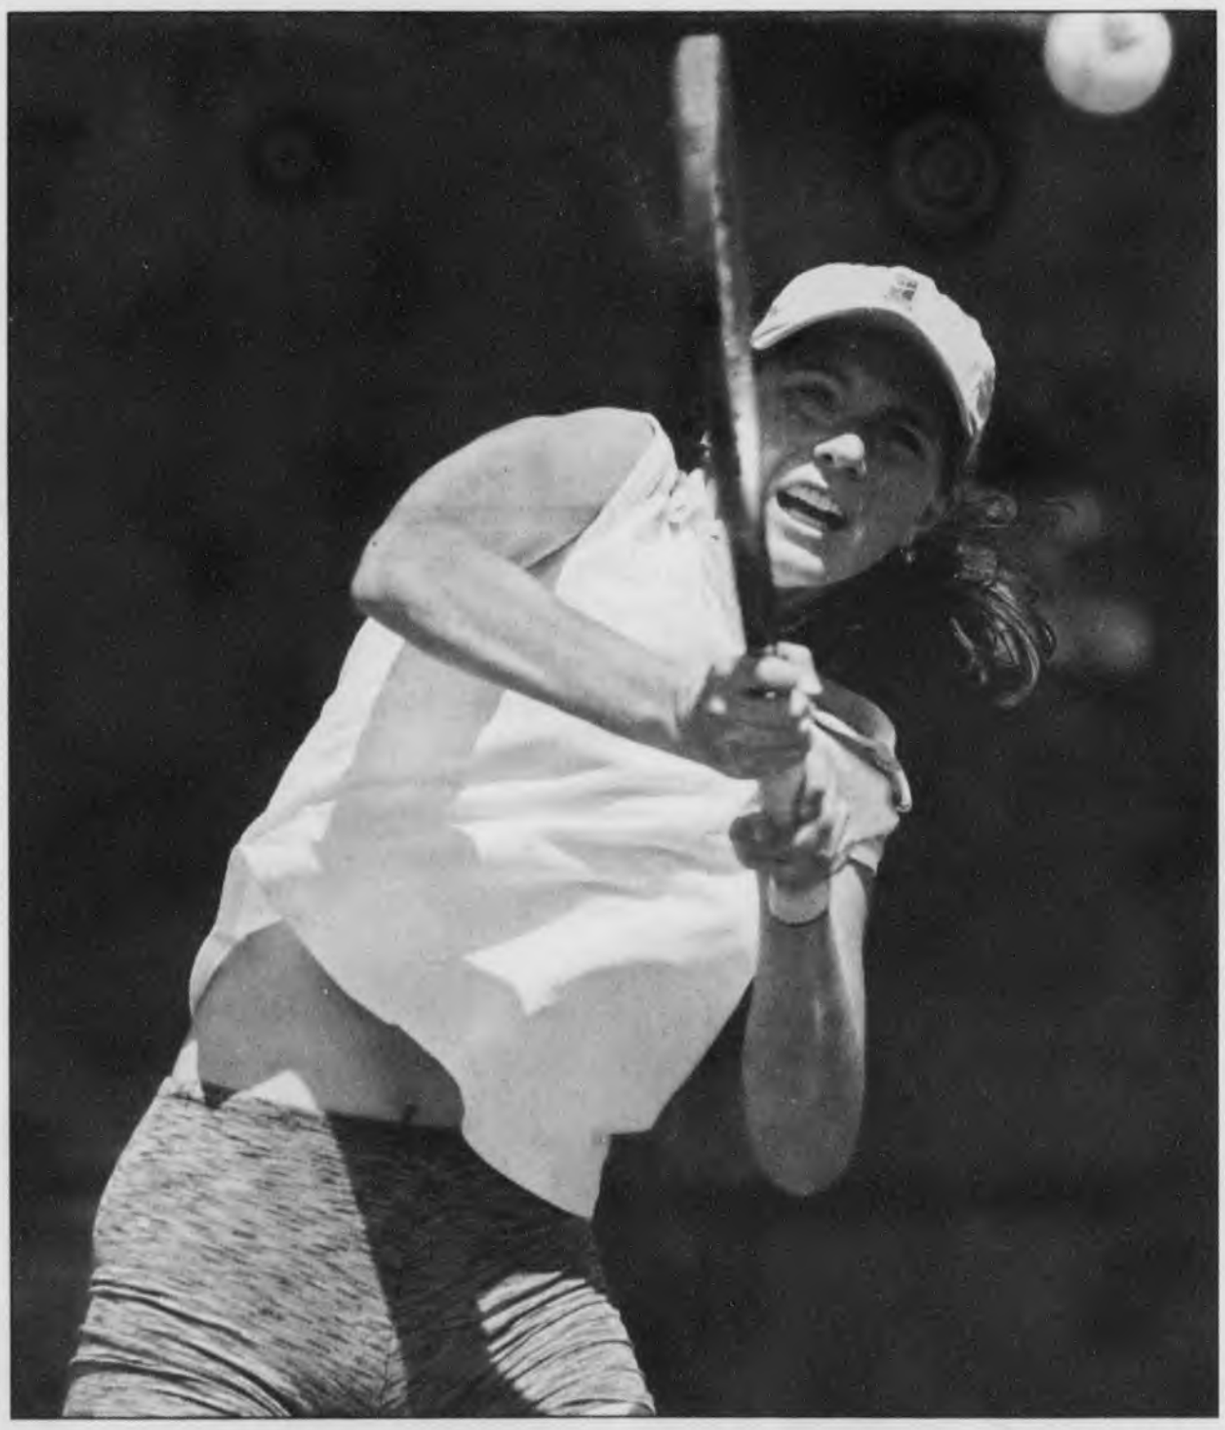
Baylor, Oklahoma and Texas A&M round out the top three.

The Cats have four conference series left — against Baylor next week, Iowa State, Kansas and Texas Tech — to finish the season.

"We want to get in the tournament, and the only way we can do that is win, and right now we aren't doing that," Ayres said.

"It's discouraging, but I think everyone knows that we need to turn things around."

K-State will try to turn things around as it faces Fort Hays State University in a single game tonight at 7 p.m. tonight at Frank Myers Field. Tom Henshaw will get the start for the Cats.



The Tigers are no slouch team. Fort Hays State sits at 32-10 for the year, including 15 of its past 18.

"There are no patsies out there," Hensley said "You've got to prepare yourself to play baseball no matter who the opponent is, no matter if we are at Frank Myers or at Norman. We have to play baseball."

Tennis team earns 6-3 win in last home match for 4 seniors

SENIOR LENA PILIPTCHAK RETURNS A HIT AGAINST A BAYLOR OPPONENT IN SINGLES MONDAY AT THE L.P. WASHBURN TENNIS COMPLEX.

DAN CATALDI
Kansas State Collegian

For Yana Dorodnova, Lena Piliptchak, Chris Schulte and Dinah Watson, Monday was their last chance to shine on their home courts of the L.P. Washburn Tennis Complex.

And shine they did.

The four seniors led the Wildcat tennis team to a 6-3 victory over the Baylor Bears on an extremely windy day.

At No. 1 singles, Dorodnova continued her brilliant season by beating the Bears' Hortensia Hernandez 6-3, 6-3. This victory moved Dorodnova to 14-4 overall and 6-2 in the Big 12 Conference this spring.

"This win was very important for me," Dorodnova said. "I really wanted to finish well."

Watson also stood out by winning both her singles and doubles matches. In singles, she blew past Lauren Spears in straight sets, 6-1, 6-4.

"I played pretty well in singles," Watson said.

At No. 3 doubles, she teamed with freshman Anna Pampoulova to post a 9-8 (7-5) win. After leading early 5-2, the tandem had trouble finishing the match.

"We stopped dominating," Watson said.

"We backed off when we got a little bit comfortable with the match."

They said they turned the match around by deciding they needed to win to ensure a K-State victory in the meet.

"They were a little bit afraid of losing," assistant coach Robert Novotny said.

After finishing the six singles matches ahead 4-2, the Cats needed only one victory in doubles to win the dual meet.

"We played pretty well in singles," Coach Steve Bietau said. "Our team was very patient in difficult conditions."

After the No. 1 team of Dorodnova and Piliptchak lost, it looked as though the Cats might have had another 5-4 meet. However, the No. 2 doubles team of Eva Novotna' and Martina Pospisilova, both freshmen, fought back late in the match to garner a meet-clinching 9-7 win over Baylor's Hernandez and Claudia Aguilar.

This win for the duo was the second of the day for each. Pospisilova cruised at No. 3 singles with a 6-0, 6-2 win over Aguilar.

At No. 4, Novotna' won against the Bears' Sophie Goldschmidt 6-4, 1-6, 6-0.

Pospisilova's victory improved her singles record to 6-3 overall and 5-2 in the conference since joining the Cats midway through the season.

"The biggest thing was the way we handled the pressure," Bietau said. "They were able to play well at the most important times."

The Cats are now poised to finish the year at .500 with a win in their season finale against Nebraska after this victory ran their mark to 9-10 overall.

A win over Nebraska also would give the Cats a winning record in the Big 12.

"It's a very big win," Bietau said.

"It's the biggest here for this team. We needed to beat somebody better."

Bishop struggles to keep head up, smile intact after off-season arrest, exoneration

You've seen Michael Bishop run. You know he can run. You saw him set a Big 12 record for rushing yardage by a quarterback in the game against Missouri.

You've seen Bishop throw. You know he can throw. You saw him set a couple Fiesta Bowl records, passing for 317 yards and four touchdowns.

You haven't seen Bishop in action during a news conference.

Unless you see him around K-State's campus, you probably haven't seen the Heisman smile, yet. You haven't seen the almost childlike sparkle in his eyes when you ask him about the upcoming season, about spring practice, about possibilities of winning the Heisman trophy.

You weren't in the Big Eight Room at Vanier Football Complex last week when Bishop made his grand appearance at the spring football news conference amidst a jumbled floor of sportswriters, either.

Coach Bill Snyder was addressing the status of his team's running game, passing game and 18 returning starters when, while in mid-sentence, Bishop waltzed in, stepped left, cut right, ducked a TV camera, kicked and nearly sent a TV station's 15-foot light stand crashing to the carpet.

All eyes focused on the embarrassed, stumbling, future Heisman candidate, who revealed the broad smile sportswriters had missed since Tempe painted itself purple and the Orangemen went down.

"Nice job, Michael," Snyder said with a grin.

Bishop's head shook in laughter.

VIEWPOINT

D. SCOTT FRITCHEN

Scott is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Scott at dfritch@ksu.edu.

This is how it begins. This is how K-State's first legitimate, preseason Heisman hopeful starts a promising campaign — being apprehended by a skinny video fixture in a jumbled den of note pads, recorders and TV-camera cables.

It was a brilliant day. The sun settled on the midfield Powercat inside KSU Stadium. Godfather's Pizza's spicy aftertaste from a noon luncheon mixed with spring football anxiety. There were more Snyder one-liners than Tom Osborne and Bobby Bowden could count on their fingers and toes. Light-hearted. A few laughs.

This was how news conferences are supposed to be.

Until the Aggieville question was asked. You knew it was going to be asked. You saw it coming like a bullet pass from the Heisman hopeful.

"Bill, how upset were you about the whole Aggieville thing and Michael Bishop?"

The question caught you square in the chest, knocked out your breath, and you sat there and waited for Snyder to speak.

You see, unless you have been sipping sake in Nagano, Japan, during this brief football intermission, you know Bishop was bludgeoned by a cloud of controversy stemming from an incident outside Lucky BrewGrille on Feb. 22 that left him arrested and two bar-goers injured.

You heard about the fight, the one Bishop tried to break up. Lots of commotion. You know witnesses saw his face and knew his name. After all, the Heisman hopeful was no ordinary John Q. Student.

"I would like to be treated that way, but I play football at K-State and am the quarterback," Bishop said. "Everybody takes notice at all times."

But Bishop was innocent. Innocent all along. Ever since Bishop stood before a nationally televised audience holding the Fiesta Bowl offensive player-of-the-game trophy, he was followed like Barnum and Bailey. Everywhere he wandered, fans wanted his time, his autograph or a handshake. Each time, Bishop said, "Sure," and flashed the Heisman smile.

Only now, no one knew what to think of Bishop.

No one really knew what happened except Bishop and a handful of others. He treated the situation like a Nebraska loss. The actual story surfaced a week later, and Bishop was cleared of two charges of aggravated battery.

However, the damage already had been done.

"You can't unring a bell," Snyder said.

Bishop received letters from fans. Three negative letters denounced him as an unfit role model. Snyder called those respondents and told them they had it all wrong — their role model was a good guy.

But all it took was a shopping visit to Manhattan Town Center one afternoon after the court ruling for Bishop to grasp the disappointment of not being able to unring a bell. A mall customer with a child approached him, and the child looked Bishop in the eyes and said, "I don't like you anymore."

You'll never see Bishop break down. You've seen the last of him in an unpopular spotlight. After all, you know the unpopular spotlight only has intensified his desire to turn this off-season negative into an outstanding positive in September.

You know Michael Bishop.

He has the Heisman smile.

Organization tries to legalize marijuana

TODD PACEY
Kansas State Collegian

"Every 49 seconds, another marijuana arrest; 642,000 last year. It's time for a change."

This message pops up at natlnorml.org, the home page for the National Organization for the Reformation of Marijuana Laws. This organization was founded in 1970 with the sole purpose of ending the criminal prohibition of marijuana.

One of the beliefs of NORML is that responsible smokers of marijuana are neither a threat nor a danger to America, and they should not be treated as criminals. Its definition of responsible use requires that the person is an adult and does not operate heavy machinery such as a vehicle while under the influence of the drug.

Sgt. Bill Reese of the Riley County Police Department said he disagrees.

> "CAN YOU PUT TOBACCO IN A WATER PIPE? SURE. BUT IS THAT WHAT PEOPLE USE IT FOR? NO."
> SGT. BILL REESE > of the Riley County Police Department

"Society is a victim. There is no such thing as a casual smoker. Over 50 percent of marijuana smokers are involved in other illegal activities," Reese said.

Marijuana is not free, nor is it cheap, Reese said. He said a quarter of an ounce of marijuana can cost anywhere from $20 to $40, depending on the quality of the product and who is selling the drug. If the person is a regular dealer, the price is lower than from people who simply are trying to sell their own supply in an attempt to make back their money and still have marijuana to smoke, Reese said.

Reese said not enough people roll their own cigarettes to justify the exorbitant amount of Zig Zag rolling papers sold in Manhattan. Other ways to smoke the drug are through a water pipe or in a metal or wooden pipe. All these items are sold at On the Wildside in Aggieville for tobacco purposes only.

"Can you put tobacco in a water pipe? Sure. But is that what people use it for? No," Reese said.

Reese said the Wildside is not doing anything illegal, because the current statute states the officers must prove the paraphernalia is used for illegal activity. The sale of the pipes and accessories is legal. However, once the pipe is used to smoke marijuana, it is illegal.

Reese said if an officer finds a pipe on a suspect, the officer will smell the pipe to determine if a field test needs to be done.

A sample taken from the pipe is tested to determine what was smoked in the pipe. Reese said if the test comes back negative three times, they will give the pipe back and allow the subject to leave.

On campus, Sgt. Zoe Heaton-Lehne of the K-State Police Department said that in 1998 K-State police have received 13 complaints of marijuana, which resulted in 5 arrests. Heaton-Lehne said this only includes residence halls, greek housing and one incident at Bramlege Coliseum. This is also a decline in the number of complaints from previous years, Heaton-Lehne said.

On a federal level, NORML is not winning the war, but it is winning several battles in the states. Since its inception, 25 states have passed laws moving toward the decriminalization of marijuana by allowing some patients to smoke the drug therapeutically.

Kansas is not one of these states. In Kansas, possession of marijuana or any paraphernalia can mean up to one year in prison and a fine of up to $2,500. Federally, marijuana is known as a Schedule I drug, meaning it has no medical or otherwise redeeming qualities and cannot be tested.

In 1970, NORML petitioned the government to reclassify marijuana as a Schedule II drug, which would allow it to be smoked for medicinal reasons and more testing on the drug could be done. However, 22 years later the Supreme Court dismissed the petition despite numerous medical journals and institutes' findings on the medicinal qualities on marijuana.

The American Public Health Association, the British Medical Association and the New England Journal of Medicine all have given support and credibility to the medicinal value of smoking marijuana.

Keith Stroup, executive director and founder of NORML, told Congress last year the war on drugs is not actually a war, because, if it was, alcohol and tobacco would be the main targets.

Stroup said tobacco companies have been the discussion of many lawsuits, and both alcohol and tobacco might cause significant harm to an individual. No one ever has died because of smoking marijuana, making it more safe than aspirin, Stroup said.

Reese said he does believe marijuana is an inherent problem to society. Several states, with the help of NORML, are simply attempting to make it inherent to society without causing a problem.

Biofeedback might relieve stress-related headaches

JOHN FRANSON
Kansas State Collegian

Headaches, insomnia, hypertension. Some college students suffer from these on a regular basis. The culprit might be stress, which can cause or worsen these and other symptoms.

But relief is close at hand. The biofeedback training center at University Counseling Services in Lafene Health Center might be able to help.

During biofeedback, students use sensors attached to a computer to monitor skin temperature, sweat, muscle tension, heart rate, respiration and brain waves. This indicates how much stress or anxiety a person might be feeling.

Biofeedback users then can use one of several techniques to try to lower their stress. The computer indicates through audio and visual feedback how well the technique is being demonstrated.

"Feedback is an essential ingredient in learning any kind of skill. And the feedback from your body, which we measure, enables you to learn relaxation and self-regulation skills, which there are a variety of," said Art Rathbun, counselor and biofeedback specialist at University Counseling Services.

For example, visualization can be used to lower stress, which will in turn raise skin temperature.

"I'm imagining myself back on the beach in Cancun where I just was for spring break, and if I place myself into that scene, other things slide out of my mind, then my skin temperature is probably going to go up, because it's a warm, relaxing place," Rathbun said.

> "WE'RE KIND OF UNUSUAL. MOST COUNSELING CENTERS DON'T HAVE BIOFEEDBACK."
> KAREN GINGERICH
> psychology intern at University Counseling Services

To regulate body feedback, biofeedback users can use other methods such as breathing techniques, systematic desensitization (used to overcome phobias) and meditation, Rathbun said. Once a particular skill is learned, students can use it outside of the biofeedback center.

"Once you've learned it, you have to apply it, and you have to intentionally apply it and get in the habit of applying it, and do it all the time," he said. "Say you go into a test and you start to feel anxious, and you use the skill to calm yourself down. Then you are applying the skill in a natural situation."

The $25 price for a semester of biofeedback training is a bargain, Rathbun said, especially compared with the typical cost of biofeedback.

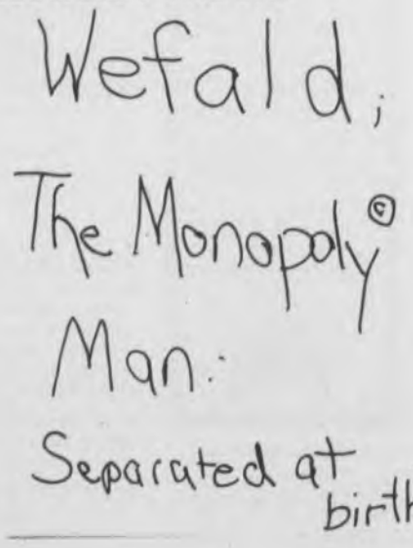
"You can go to Topeka, and you'll pay anywhere between $75 to $105 an hour, depending on the place you go. Here at K-State, the $25 will give you a whole semester, which would be 16 weeks."

Rathbun said more than 200 students use the biofeedback training center. The center also teaches two courses for people who will be using biofeedback equipment therapeutically or in research, and these students act as trainers for biofeedback clients.

Karen Gingerich, a psychology intern at University Counseling Services who is taking the biofeedback classes, works with biofeedback clients in addition to counseling, outreach presentation and crisis management. Many therapists refer their clients to biofeedback centers, she said.

"On my case load, three of the people I see for therapy I also work with for biofeedback," she said.

Learning biofeedback therapy might give her an edge in her career, Gingerich said.



"It's kind of a speciality that a lot of people don't have, so it's a good thing to have because most people don't have access to it," she said. "We're kind of unusual. Most counseling centers don't have biofeedback."

K-State was a pioneer in the use of biofeedback with students, starting in the 1960s.

The center has the largest system in the country with the latest equipment, and it is always upgrading, Rathbun said. The center wants to buy a portable biofeedback unit so it can promote its services.

"We could just go around with a case that will have a portable computerized equipment and help do assessments and trainings right at, say, the Rec center, or perhaps in a dormitory," he said.

English Language Program finishes recruitment tour in Southeast Asia

▶PROGRAM AIMS TO COMBAT K-STATE'S LOW PERCENTAGE OF INTERNATIONAL STUDENTS.

MIKE BURGESS
Kansas State Collegian

Representatives of the English Language Program handed out more than 8,000 pieces of information about K-State during a recruiting tour in Southeast Asia during February and March.

Jim Lewis, English Language Program instructor and tour participant, said the tour included 10 days of exhibitions at eight different sites where K-State literature was distributed. The literature included information on the English Language Program, the graduate and undergraduate schools, and with information on specific programs such as business administration, physics and engineering.

Jim Endrizzi, programs director for the International Student Center and tour participant, said the percentage of international students has risen nationally while K-State's international population has decreased significantly.

"Foreign student enrollment has increased two percent over the last four years, while we've decreased 26 percent," he said. "There have not been any major policy changes affecting foreign students that could account for that."

He said he thinks the decrease has been happening because K-State has been relying on word-of-mouth recruiting.

"And while word of mouth is good, there are so many other universities that are on these tours actively recruiting students and making the personal contact," he said.

He said he does not think relying solely on word-of-mouth recruitment works.

"I feel that we are going to continue to see our's decrease until we do a very concerted effort to get information out about K-State," he said.

Lewis said he hopes they will be able to continue with tours like this.

"A lot of the other participants on the tour felt that it really takes a few years of active recruiting in this fashion to see a gain in applications," he said.

He said it takes a few years to develop a pipeline of alumni and contacts for a particular country.

"With a pipeline, you get very capable students," he said. "At least that is what I saw, and a lot of the other people on the tour said that this is the kind of results that they got from doing this."

Enid Cocke, director of ELP, said she was happy with the number of interested students the group had despite the Asian economic crisis.

"I'm very encouraged by the turnout they had," she said. "We all know there is a currency crisis in the region they visited, yet they were mobbed by interested students at every sitting."

Cocke said her hope for the tour was to get K-State's name out there.

"I think that Jim and Jim were very successful at that. They made a lot of contacts and brought back a lot of business cards with people from those countries that would be interested in setting up agreements with K-State."

She said those contacts want to set up articulation agreements, that would recognize transfer credit from those schools.

She said she hopes the ELP will be able to do the tours again.

"There is a momentum that builds with repeated contact with those students, schools and advisers," she said.

She said she hopes the university will take responsibility for ensuring an adequate international enrollment at K-State.

"I hope the central administration will want to put money into international recruiting," she said. "That's because Kansas students live so far from foreign borders, yet many will go into jobs with international contacts, and a major state university owes them some sort of international experience."

Brownback pushing bill that would cut tax code

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Sen. Sam Brownback said he isn't sure if a bill he is pushing that will eliminate the Internal Revenue Code and replace it with some other taxing system can gain U.S. Senate approval this year.

But it's close, Brownback said during a Statehouse news conference Monday, at which the National Federation of Independent Business touted Brownback's bill and honored two Republican legislators — Reps. Phill Kline, R-Shawnee, and Carol Edward Beggs, R-Salina — for their work on behalf of small business.

Brownback said his legislation, called the Tax Code Termination Act, got 58 votes two weeks ago when a non-binding "sense of the Senate" resolution was adopted. However, he said he doesn't know if it can muster the 60 votes needed to bring closure to expected debate designed to stall it.

"Whether we have the 60 votes to get past cloture remains to be seen," Brownback said.

Brownback said he has 38 co-sponsors on the bill, including GOP leaders Trent Lott, R-Miss., Don Nickles, R-Okla., and Connie Mack, R-Fla.

He said the first goal is to end the present income tax system in the United States by the end of the year 2001 and start Congress working in the meantime to come up with a replacement system.

He said the two most popular ideas are to levy a percentage flat tax on all incomes, perhaps with a few exemptions such as home mortgage interest, and a national sales tax.

The flat tax is most popular in Kansas, while the sales tax is most popular nationally, Brownback said.

To those who criticize it as reckless and irresponsible to advocate abolishing the IRS without having a plan to replace it, Brownback said the effort to balance the federal budget raised the same kind of objections in the early going.

He said he sees development of an alternative tax system between now and the end of 2001, then a gradual phase-in of the replacement system — perhaps as long as 15 years, "So you don't get the economic dislocation that worries people. That's the last thing we want to do."

NFIB plans to circulate petitions Wednesday — national tax day — asking people to sign if they support abolition of the IRS. It is calling Wednesday "It's Our Money, Not Theirs" Day.

The Kansas chapter hopes to gather more than 2,500 signatures at post offices in Wichita and Kansas City, Kan. Nationally, the organization of small businesses is collecting signatures in 90 major cities and hopes to deliver a million signatures to Congress.

Manhattan development sees shift to west side

the next 10 years.

Ray Weisenburger, who has spent the past 18 years on the city's planning board, said a mall wouldn't pass the planning board now, but it could in the future.

Weisenburger, associate dean of the College of Architecture, Planning and Design, said that he doesn't think Manhattan would get involved in creating a focal point on the west side because its policies advocate the central business district as Manhattan's focal point.

Such development probably would be developed privately.

Finding common ground

Manhattan may not be splintering into two separate communities, but many find establishing a common ground between the west side and the central city difficult.

Bruce Snead, Manhattan mayor and former member of the planning board, said reconciling the two halves of the city is going to be a real challenge.

"Once the infrastructure is in place, once the houses are in place, the transition to a different paradigm is much bigger," Snead said.

Unifying the west side and lessening the sprawl effect depends mainly on community support. As residents demand the type of housing developers are currently providing, the sprawl west will continue.

But Phillips said he thinks that could change.

A "New Urbanism" — a recent planning philosophy that has gained ground in many cities — looks back to past patterns of development by imposing a street grid, lessening lot size and mixing densities.

"It's possible that planning and zoning regulations could impose that kind of development pattern, but there has to be strong political consensus in the community," Phillips said. "If people aren't willing to pay for a 'New Urbanist' environment, there might not be a developer willing to do it."

April 15 brings an annual rush of people finishing up and mailing their federal and state tax returns.

The Manhattan Post Office will be staying open late today to accommodate last-minute postal customers. Income tax returns can be mailed until 10 tonight.

"It's always the big rush on April 15," Amy Tucker, postal service representative, said.

Melissa O'Brate, from H & R Block, said the tax-return preparation firm is seeing an increase in business.

O'Brate said H & R Block had nine employees working Tuesday, each with 8-10 scheduled appointments, plus walk-ins.

Most of the customers coming in now are not students, O'Brate said. She said most students got refunds.

"Most of the people coming in now have to pay, and they wait 'til the last minute," O'Brate said.

O'Brate said students have relatively simple tax returns, although they do run into a few complications.

Many college students do not know if their parents still claim them as dependents, O'Brate said.

Out-of-state students might run into other problems, O'Brate said.

"A lot of K-State students are from other states, and there is a problem sometimes doing their foreign returns. There are 50 states, and every state has a different law," O'Brate said.

After tax returns are prepared, they must be filed.

About 58,000 state returns were filed Tuesday by the phone, Sheila Walker, public information officer, said.

She said she expects April 15 to be the heaviest day.

Walker offered some advice for people who have not yet filed.

"If you haven't filed yet, the best way to file is Kansas Telefile," Walker said. "It's fast, and the call is free."

There has been a 10-percent increase in the number of people filing over the phone this year.

City fined $137,500 by agency

KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

The federal Environmental Protection Agency has fined the city of Manhattan $137,500 for alleged violations of the Federal Clean Water Act concerning the use or disposal of its sewage sludge, or biosolids.

The city was charged with spraying too much sludge on farmland south of the Kansas River from 1993 to August 1996 and failure to turn in reports during those years in the March 31 EPA order.

City Manager Gary Greer said the sludge is now being stored in holding tanks, and the city possibly is planning to hire a private company to haul it away.

The city received notice of these fines April 1. The EPA compliance order said the city had to stop spraying the sludge on the land, find the necessary records and form a plan within 30 days to meet the order.

Greer said right now they are in the appeal process and said as of Tuesday the city is in no violation of these regulations.

Greer said there had been some concerns with biosolid disposal in the past before he became city manager in November 1995, but since that time the city has made the needed changes to comply with the EPA regulations.

"These charges date five years back," he said.

The city received both EPA's Order of Compliance and Order of Penalty at the same time. Normally, Greer said, the city receives the compliance order first and then is given a specific amount of time to make the necessary changes.

Penalties are given then if the necessary changes are not implemented.

"They chose to give us both at the same time," Greer said. "It's a complete mystery to me why they chose to do it this way."

Greer said the EPA's notification process might be used when they appeal the fine.

The Biosolids Management Advisory Group, organized by Morgan Powell, biological and agricultural engineering professor, has helped the city in the past few years after the alleged violations on improvements to their biosolid disposal methods.

Powell said there might have been some things in the past that were not done correctly, but the city has taken significant strives to correct those situations.

"I realize it takes environmental agencies a while to get through the red tape that comes with bringing legal action against the city," Powell said, "but it seems to me that they are closing the door after the horse has gone.

"I was surprised they would have that kind of legal action after changes have been made."

Bruce McCallum, former utilities director, resigned eight days before the notice of violation was received. He was unable to be reached for comment.

Hotel construction marks beginning of downtown expansion

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

Editor's Note: This is the second in a series of stories focusing on Manhattan's development. Thursday's story will look at the powers of the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board.

Imagine not needing a car.

Imagine living within walking distance of shopping, restaurants, government offices — even your job.

Now imagine those circumstances existing right here in Manhattan's downtown — a place not generally considered by the majority of the city's residents as a place to live.

While downtown is home to a number of Manhattan residents in both apartments and single-family homes, many of the city's planners envision increasing that number while reinforcing the area's significance as a business district for the surrounding region. In short, planners throughout the city hope downtown is on the verge of a new era.

Planning for Growth

The June 8 opening of the Fairfield Inn, near the corner of Pierre and Fourth streets, for many represents a future leverage arm of new development that eventually could spur further growth — even a renewal of downtown as a place to live for a variety of residents. After all, it's not every decade that a new hotel is built in a city's central business district.

"How do you get people to move back there?" said Jerry Reynard, a member of the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board for three years. He said he thinks the city could offer a tax incentive of some kind to lure families looking for both single-family homes and higher-density residences.

Reynard, along with many in the planning community, wants to see downtown remain the central focus of Manhattan. As representative city planners, the individuals on the planning board and the Manhattan City Commission hold the fate of a residential/commercial downtown in their hands. And the common theme that emerges from talking with them is that significant commercial development should remain in the vicinity of downtown.

A different way to live

While downtown business is always a concern for city officials, a series of plans — namely the 1991 Comprehensive Plan for Manhattan and a Poyntz Avenue Corridor Plan — have focused some energy on making downtown a place to live.

"I think the overall city would benefit from a higher density housing development downtown," said Brent Bowman, principal architect with Brent Bowman and Associates. He has been involved with efforts to interest developers in investing in high-density housing — such as rowhouses, or townhouses as they're also known — in the downtown area.

Bowman said he sees many opportunities for infill, suggesting that the central core of Manhattan sometimes can be inconsistently developed with low

Clinton discusses race equality in sports during live town hall meeting on ESPN

HOUSTON — Giving a sharper focus to his national dialogue on race, President Clinton on Tuesday urged Americans to look to the world of sports as an example of how individuals of different races can join in a common effort.

"It is important that people see that in athletics in America that the rules are fair, that people get their fair chance," Clinton said in leading off a 105-minute nationally televised discussion on the role of race in sports.

An avid fan of college basketball and professional sports, Clinton is well versed in sensitive issues such as white dominance in coaching and sports team ownership. He said that if professional sports want more minority coaches but cannot find them, "then there's something wrong with recruitment."

The meeting, broadcast live on ESPN, was the second of Clinton's three planned nationally televised town hall meetings on race. The first was in Akron, Ohio, last December.

The 11-member panel discussed several topics but returned often to the relative shortage of minorities in top sports-management jobs. Georgetown University basketball coach John Thompson said blacks must be given more opportunities, even if they are not seen as sure-fire coaching successes right away.

"I'm sick of us having to be perfect to get the job," Thompson said.

But Thompson took exception when former Cleveland Browns running back Jim Brown also suggested that black college stars turn more often to black agents in launching their professional sports careers.

Clinton said he was optimistic that talking about race in the context of sports can help the nation deal with broader racial issues.

"America, rightly or wrongly, is a sports crazy country," he said. "And we often see games as a metaphor or symbol of what we are as a people."

At the close of Tuesday's program, Clinton said he hoped the message would get through to America's youth that athletics can help develop racial harmony.

Newspaper stricken by natural disasters earns Pulitzer Prize for public service

NEW YORK — Its plant ravaged by flood and fire and most of its 57 newsroom employees victims themselves, just publishing at all was a huge accomplishment for the Grand Forks Herald.

But the paper did get published, forging a bond with a community in crisis. On Tuesday, the 37,000-circulation daily was rewarded with journalism's highest honor, the Pulitzer Prize for public service.

"It would have been worth it, even if we hadn't gotten the prize," news editor Jeff Beach said. "People in the community are starting to talk about remembering the Herald again, from that special time during the flood when it was being snapped up at all the refugee centers and how very important it was to people. I think that meant more than the prize."

Then he added, "But the prize is nice, too."

Among other Pulitzer Prize winners announced Tuesday, The New York Times won three awards and the Los Angeles Times won two.

Also honored was the Riverdale Press, a New York City weekly with a circulation of 11,800. Editor and co-publisher Bernard L. Stein won for editorials on politics and city issues.

The New York Times won for beat reporting, international reporting and criticism, and the Los Angeles Times was honored for breaking news reporting and feature photography.

In the arts, Philip Roth won his first Pulitzer, in fiction, for his 22nd book, "American Pastoral." The award for biography went to Katharine Graham, chairman of the executive committee of The Washington Post Co., for her autobiography, "Personal History."

Other arts winners included Edward J. Larson in history, for "Summer for the Gods: The Scopes Trial and America's Continuing Debate Over Science and Religion"; Charles Wright in poetry for "Black Zodiac"; Paula Vogel in drama for "How I Learned to Drive"; Jared Diamond in general non-fiction for "Guns, Germs, and Steel: The Fates of Human Societies"; and Aaron Jay Kernis in music for "String Quartet No. 2 Musica Instrumentalis."

Mike McAlary of the New York Daily News won in the commentary category for columns on the alleged attack on Haitian immigrant Abner Louima by police in a Brooklyn stationhouse. McAlary scored the first interview with Louima, from his hospital bedside days after the attack.

Gary Cohn and Will Englund of The Sun of Baltimore won the investigative reporting award for a series on dangers posed to workers and the environment when discarded ships are dismantled.

Paul Salopek of the Chicago Tribune won in the explanatory reporting category for a profile of the Human Genome Diversity Project, which seeks to chart the genetic relationship among all people.

Thomas French of the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times was honored for feature writing for a portrait of a mother and two daughters killed while on a Florida vacation.

The editorial cartooning prize went to Stephen P. Breen of the Asbury Park (N.J.) Press. The award in spot news photography went to Martha Rial of the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette for portraits of survivors of the conflicts in Rwanda and Burundi.

Winning a special citation was the late George Gershwin, honored for his contribution to American music on the centennial of his birth.

The prizes are presented annually by Columbia University. Prizes include an award of $5,000, except for the public service award, which is a gold medal.

Drinking water in Russell area contains cancer-causing chemicals, regulators say

RUSSELL, Kan. — State water regulators have found cancer-causing chemicals in the drinking water of a central Kansas rural area, apparently from plastic water pipes.

The Kansas Department of Health and Environment said samples of water from Russell County Rural Water District No. 3 showed high levels of vinyl chloride, which is known to cause cancer in humans.

This is the second rural water district in Kansas where polyvinyl chloride, or PVC, pipe has tainted drinking water with vinyl chloride. Sections of pipe in Doniphan County's Rural Water District No. 5, in northeast Kansas, also have caused contamination.

Nevertheless, the state isn't classifying the Russell County discovery as any immediate public health threat, department spokesman Greg Crawford said Monday. "But we do want to continue to monitor it."

The Vinyl Institute represents the manufacturers of vinyl chloride and PVC resin used to make the plastic pipe.

"Unfortunately, I'm not surprised" by the Russell County findings, the institute's Tim Patterson said Monday.

Patterson said the industry knew a certain percentage of pipes made before 1976 had the potential to release vinyl chloride in drinking water.

The combination of older pipe, warm weather and long lines of pipe, in which water might sit for hours, can raise vinyl chloride levels above what federal regulators consider safe, he said.

Editor's Note: The names of the parking control officers used as sources in this story have been changed to avoid the possibility of harassment.

As the official bearers of bad news, parking control officers at K-State often get more input about their job performance than other employees do.

After issuing tickets, officers sometimes have to deal with negative responses from recipients.

Cory said he often is yelled at by the people to whom he has issued tickets.

"You have to deal with an irate person every day you work," he said. "I don't give tickets to ruin someone's day. I do it because it's a job, and it pays my rent."

Kurt said that at the residence halls, he has had things thrown out of windows at him, including water balloons.

He said the bad image parking control officers have is unjustified.

"We are really not Nazis. If there is a name, we've been called it. I would put working here above flipping burgers," Kurt said. He also said being a parking control officer is difficult because he only sees the bad customers — those he tickets, and he never has contact with the good customers — those who park legally.

Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services, said he sees ticketing as a vital service to the university.

"We see ticketing as a customer service. We are providing a space for those people who buy permits and pay their meters," he said.

And for some, having a permit that allows them to park close to a building is a necessity, such as those who have reserved-space permits because of physical conditions.

Kurt said he especially looks for cars illegally parked in handicapped and medical-reserve parking spaces, because those spaces are important services to those who have permits.

A few facts and regulations collected from Parking Services:

- A car can be re-ticketed every two hours in a metered spot at the K-State Student Union.
- If a meter is broken, Parking Services will fix the meter and then put the maximum amount of time possible on the meter. If a meter breaks while a car is parked there, you must notify Parking Services of the malfunction within two hours of receiving the citation for it to be excused.
- If you had paid all your previous tickets, or have none on your record, there is no way you will end up with a wheel lock on your car in one day.
- If you are ticketed while parked in Lafene Health Center client parking you must return to Lafene and have the ticket validated.
- If your vehicle breaks down while parked on campus, K-State Police or Parking Services must be notified. If the vehicle is not removed in 48 hours, it is subject to impoundment and fines.
- There are 1.1 permits issued for each spot on campus excluding residence hall parking.

HOW TO APPEAL A PARKING TICKET

1. You receive a ticket that you do not think you should have to pay.

2. Do not pay the ticket.

3. Within eight days of receiving the ticket, you should go to the back entrance of Edwards Hall to Parking Services. You can park in the lot if you have a permit, but if you do not have a permit, you must park in the meters at the far end of the lot.

4. The Parking Services desk will give you a form to fill out. You will need to bring the ticket and your license plate number.

5. The ticket is then entered into the computer with an "A" designation. This means this ticket will not show up on a Parking Control Officer's equipment if they issue you a ticket during the appeal process.

6. Your appeal is then given to two Parking Citation Appeals Board members. They each make a decision individually and then the two decisions are compared.

a. If their decisions match, then the decision stands. You will receive a letter in the mail. If your appeal is granted, the appeal process is over. If your appeal is not granted, you are required to pay your original fine within eight business days. If you do not pay within eight business days, you will be charged the same $5 late fee.

b. If their decisions do not match, the appeal is given to a third PCAB member. The third member's decision stands. You will receive a letter no matter what the decision is. You may go in and ask what the board member's votes were. If it was a split decision, you have the option to appeal again by submitting more information or going before the board.

KSU Parking Services' employess unfair victims

The frustration students feel because of overcrowded parking lots and chronic campus parking problems is often transferred onto the Parking Services' employees.

Parking Services' employees are often the target of frustration and even verbal abuse from parking violators. These student employees often get a bad rap for performing the duties of their job.

In reality, Parking Services offers more than tickets and wheel locks to student drivers. Services include validating tickets for Lafene Health Center Client Parking, issuing temporary medical permits and regulating and enforcing vehicle and bicycle laws on campus.

A Parking Mission Statement hangs on the office wall of Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services. The statement is a commitment to providing as positive a parking experience as possible, given the limitation of space, finances, rules and regulations under which Parking Services operates.

To avoid tickets, students should obey parking regulations on campus, and to avoid wheel locks, students should pay parking tickets on time. There is an appeals process in place to eradicate potentially wrongful tickets because of special circumstances, broken meters or malfunctions.

The act of paying parking tickets is even convenient for students. There are drop boxes located all over campus so students aren't required to go to Edwards Hall, where Parking Services is located.

Parking Services performs important duties to maintain a level of campus security and order. This service provides enforcement of handicapped or reserved parking stalls and tickets vehicles abusing metered or permit-required lots.

K-State definitely has parking problems, and the space for the editorial board has often been used to vent the frustrations of student drivers and offer suggestions.

However, as often as parking issues are raised, student employees should not be demonized or harassed as part of the problem. These students are merely doing their jobs.

AS LOCAL RESTAURANTS EXPAND, MANHATTAN APPETITES CONTRACT

IT'S 1998 and the town of Manhattan is eagerly awaiting the July arrival of our newest entree in the gourmet capital of Riley County, Chili's.

The suspense of what the surely daring chef — yet to be hired, I assume — will create is killing those food aficionados lurking in our city who crave such fabulous concoctions as nachos, burgers, salads and fajitas. Oh my goodness, the latest rumor is that Chili's might even serve fried onions.

The question a critic asks is how Chili's will contribute to the local cuisine. Will it add a regional flavor, such as the risk-taking Applebee's has done, wowing audiences with incredible presentations and such over-the-top recipes as chicken strips? Or will it synthesize Manhattan cuisine with something foreign, like Wichita cuisine? One's mouth waters at the sumptuous prospects.

And one can sustain sarcasm only so long.

Therefore, a review of the restaurant highs and lows of Manhattan is quite in order. Has the scene improved much since the last review? Hardly. In fact, we've seen a continuation of the miserable prospects for dining that have always existed. This review doesn't attempt to cover all the bases, but it hits the significant highs and lows of the local scene. And it's limited by those restaurants that actually pretend to have a working kitchen (sorry, bars).

1997 can be remembered as a year when new restaurants opened, but to no fanfare for the gastronome.

Prices have stayed low, but even some of Manhattan's finest restaurants could use a change in the menu department. Nightly specials are fine (usually fish, in this town), but why not consider a warm- and cold-season menu — something that would give regulars a change of pace.

Harry's Uptown Supper Club, Little Apple Brewing Co., and The Texas Star/Hibachi Hut remain the restaurants to beat, but none experiment with their menus.

Even the basics could use an overhaul: salads at Harry's are on the small side, the pork chop at Little Apple is seasoned poorly and Texas Star's chicken fried chicken with gravy is too salty.

However, the overall combination of atmosphere, food and service make these three stalwarts old friends for anyone who enjoys sensitively prepared food that skirts tiresome, over-rated bar food on the level of an Applebee's.

In the ethnic food department, the west side rules supreme. Raoul's Escondido and El Cazador remain the two Mexican restaurants in Manhattan that at least attempt evoking traditional fare, although don't order anything that sounds too experimental. Good huevos rancheros is still too much to ask in this town. Still, both restaurants put a white-bread establishment like Carlos O'Kelly's to shame.

The best Italian joint is the kitschy Marco Polo Ristorante, almost next door to El Cazador. The entrees might be fairly typical (usual pastas, salads and such), but a good wine list and eccentric desserts (served in martini glasses with cocktail umbrellas) can make for a fun evening. And any of Manhattan's countless Oriental restaurants usually fit the bill, especially since none of them stray from a very conventional menu.

The biggest culinary disappointment of the past year was Gold Fork, which remains an absurdly titled flagship restaurant for a new chain. Bland food and a menu that confuses quantity with such necessities as quality and sensitivity are only bested by the tacky self-advertisements standing in for art on the walls and the intrusion of televisions in the dining room. Why should anyone take this food seriously with ESPN Sportscenter hovering overhead? The success of the place shores up my doubts in the local populations' complete lack of standards and culinary expectations.

Amarillo Mesquite Grill, the new mesquite steakhouse that opened in the old Country Kitchen building, is part of a new Midwest chain that has expanded voraciously into Kansas and Oklahoma. That alone, however, doesn't warrant the mixed results of the kitchen. The best advice at this place, along with Gold Fork, Applebee's, et al, is to keep it simple. Stay away from sauces that sound complex. At Amarillo, I've found that cheese sauce usually means a grainy, lackluster mess that can easily ruin a good piece of chicken.

Perhaps it's best if Kansas chefs stick to the basics, which is more or less what the chef is doing at Little Apple. Steaks, chicken, fish and a sampling of pasta can be a good thing in Kansas. Simplicity doesn't necessarily mean boring. There's something rewarding about eating a sandwich at Bob's Diner knowing the chef knows his or her limitations. Especially when the check arrives.

Reader responds to letter attacking Ramirez column

Editor,

I would like to respond to Renee Hurla's letter to the editor in Tuesday's Collegian. In the letter, Santos Ramirez is criticized for his Monday column, "Higher Education."

Although I respect Hurla's opinion, and I am sure there are others at K-State who share similar feelings, I think the point of the column was missed. To me, the column is about how some students, regardless of their ethnicity, are overlooked because they don't fit the stereotype of a college-bound student.

Students who don't score well on the ACT or who have some sort of learning disability often are forgotten when it's time to start looking at colleges. I believe the problem is the fault of our society.

We have started to forget about people and look only at scores and numbers. Luckily, K-State is a place that DOES look at the individual and is willing to take a look at ALL students who are interested in attending our institution.

I also feel I must respond to Hurla's statement that Ramirez "does nothing but whine about how badly he and other Latinos get treated." I'll admit I haven't read everything Santos has written, but what I have read has never come across as whining. Ramirez writes articles about his experiences, and as a Latino those experiences are going to be told from a Latino's point of view. If I were writing the articles, they would have an African-American's perspective, and Hurla, wouldn't you be accused of being a "whining" woman if the articles were yours?

As for Hurla's views on affirmative action, we cannot forget why the program was initiated. It was developed in order to level the playing field because there were those in positions of power who would not hire minorities (women included) regardless of their abilities. Personally, I can't wait till there is no need for affirmative action. However, that would mean that everyone would look past the color of one's skin, and look at "the content of their character" — and Hurla, we aren't there yet.

Losing loved one not limited to family, friends; many can be as attached to non-human items

Ask almost anyone, and probably they'll tell you they've lost a love sometime in their life. You know, the one that got away. Well, my lost love left my life years ago, and I've never been able to find her equal.

The year was 1990 and I just had graduated from the eighth grade. That's when I met her. She was the most beautiful piece I'd ever seen. She was long and sleek and three tones of green, with matching vinyl seats and white vinyl top. She sat low to the ground and looked like a torpedo on skates. She looked like a car but performed like a pickup and was the most perfect vehicle I'd ever seen.

She became my first car, the Jolly.

VIEWPOINT

DAVID FAIRBANKS

David is a senior in electronic journalism. You can send e-mail to David at jollyd@ksu.edu.

She's probably better described as a 1972 Ford Ranchero, an old farm vehicle that sat on a used car lot until I came along. She got the name Jolly because she reminded us of this old beat-up airplane in the movie "Cracking Up." The plane's name was the Jolly Fat Sweehawken, or something like that. Anyway, her initial purpose was to get me from house to house for my summer mowing job. But she bridged the gap between work and play and soon became my livelihood.

I was one of the first in my circle of friends to get a car, so naturally the Jolly became a focal point of our group. For a bunch of 14-year-old kids, she was our ticket to freedom. Not only could we take her where we pleased, but we could do whatever we wanted with her. She was built like a tank and could take a beating. In fact, she became the experiment car for our Driving 101 crash course.

We'd take her out to the country and see how much dust we could kick up. We'd see for how long she could peel out and how many kitties she could spin. I guess that was the thing to do if you were a bunch of bored kids looking for fun in western Kansas. At least, it was in our case.

We didn't ride her hard all the time, though. A lot of times we treated her like a queen.

One Christmas we strung running lights all around her and put a stand-up wreath in the bed. We paraded her all around town. She liked it when we showed her off. For homecoming one year, we colored her our school colors with house paint and entered her in the parade.

It wasn't all smiles all the time for us and the Jolly, though. She was subject to a series of insignificant accidents that scarred her appearance. She lost her grill, her top peeled off, her back bumper curled up from scraping the ground so much, her muffler came off repeatedly and she even had her windshield smashed in by some punk-ass vandals. She was rich in character.

It was that character that drew us to her. She was something my friends and I could all stand behind and say, "That piece of crap is OUR piece of crap."

She was our clubhouse. We even held weekly meetings in her. No Tuesday night was complete without a couple of bags of pork rinds, a two-liter bottle of strawberry soda and cigars all ablaze in her green vinyl cab.

As we pressed through high school, the Jolly was right by our sides, watching us grow up. She anxiously watched Fourth of July bottle rockets take off from her hood and sat silently as she and my friend Tracy received their first two traffic tickets together. She watched us on our journey toward manhood and even had a ring-side seat the night my journey was completed.

She spread joy in the hearts of all who traveled in her, but the joy had to end one day. I went off to college and left her sitting alone in the alley. I knew she was too weak to make the trip. My parents decided to give her away after she sat unmoving for some time. She was going to a good home, but that still didn't sit well with me. After all, she was my baby and I couldn't stand to see her go.

The day came when we were forced to part with our old girl. The guys showed up to pay their final respects and get one last good look at her.

We spoke of the past and all our adventures in my big green beast, and then she drove away. It might sound a bit melodramatic, but at the time it was really trying. We knew without her we would lack definition.

We all took souvenirs to remember her by. I got a door handle and a hub cap, and Tracy got the coveted rear view mirror.

To this day, those Jolly artifacts are displayed on the walls of our rooms back home.

It hurts to lose a love, especially one with whom you shared so much. But what keeps me going is the hope that some day we will reunite with her and revel in her beauty. Until then, however, I will keep trying to fill the void left by her absence. I know my friends will, too.

Privilege fees to remain constant for only 2nd time in past decade

KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

Despite a privilege-fee increase for students enrolled at K-State-Salina, students on the main campus will not be paying more privilege fees next year.

Students paid $251 per semester at K-State this school year. Fees will continue at this level.

Privilege fees are used to fund campus organizations and student services.

K-State showed no increase in the proposed 1999 fiscal year required fees, which have been sent to the Kansas Board of Regents and will be introduced on Thursday. Fees will be finalized in May.

Tom Schellhardt, associate vice president of administration and finance, said student privilege fees will not go up in 1999 because student activities that receive funds requested and received small increases.

Schellhardt said the university has had fee decreases in the past, but fee requests would be balanced by the increased revenue from enrollment in fiscal year 1998, Schellhardt said.

The Privilege Fee Committee worked hard to keep the fees at the same level, Schellhardt said.

Aaron Otto, Privilege Fee Committee chair, said this is the second time in the past decade that privilege fees have remained constant or decreased.

Otto said his committee compared K-State's fees with other universities, such as the University of Nebraska, the University of Missouri, the University of Kansas and the University of Colorado. He said this allowed the committee to see the differences in services funded.

"Of these places, we had the second-highest rank," Otto said. "By freezing the fees this year, we can hopefully close the gap with what we fund and they don't."

Bret Glendening, committee member, said the committee was happy with the results.

Glendening said the committee was able to neutralize any fee increases because reserve accounts, which were created to lessen the burden on students, were close to being full.

"We felt that this was the best way to go for the students," Glendening said.

The goal of the committee this year was to keep costs as low as they have been while still maintaining effective services for students, Glendening said.

For example, Lafene Health Center was able to get a funding increase next year even though no student fee increases were required, Glendening said.

"I think in the end, our tuition is very cheap concerning the quality of education we are getting," he said.

K-State students won't be the only students in the regents system who won't be paying increased student fees.

Wichita State University and Fort Hays State University both submitted a proposed decrease for their 1999 student privilege fees.

Fort Hays submitted a $1 decrease while Wichita State submitted a $1.25 decrease in privilege fees for students.

The decrease at Fort Hays is because of the elimination of its Internet Technology Fee of $1 per credit hour. The university expects legislative approval of the $1 per credit hour for technology advancement, said Johnny Williams, FHSU vice president of administration and finance.

"We had promised the students that if the bill passed then we would reduce the $1 fee," Williams said.

Williams said the bill most likely will pass, but if it doesn't, the fee will be reinstated as per an agreement with the students.

The decrease at Wichita State is because of extra revenue produced by an enrollment increase and higher production levels from salaried individuals, said Roger Lowe, WSU vice president of administration and finance.

Emporia State will experience the largest increase in fees because of lower enrollment and the increase of costs on campus, John Blaufuss, ESU controller, said. The majority of its increase will fund the student health center, which has not had a fee increase since 1990.

"They needed the increase to maintain the same level of service," Blaufuss said.

Native American dance show to highlight Heritage Month

Check it out
The Rose Hill Dance Troupe of Oklahoma will perform at the Thomas J. Frith Community Center from 7 to 9 p.m. Friday. The performance is free and open to the public, with a reception following.

The Native American Student Body will be host to a Native American Dance Exhibition as part of Heritage Month.

The Rose Hill Dance Troupe of Oklahoma will perform from 7 to 9 p.m. Friday at Jardine Terrace Apartments' Thomas J. Frith Community Center.

Tammy Goodson, NASB president, said the Rose Hill Dance Troupe is composed of 10 dancers from many different tribes, including Sac and Fox, Choctaw, Kiowa, Ponca, Pawnee, Otoe, Iowa and Navajo.

"Rose Hill will present an overview of the different styles of dance and what goes on at a powwow," Goodson said.

"Rose Hill dances to music from three singers who also play drums," she said.

"The dancers perform several styles of dance. Some of these styles include Men's Traditional, Men's Grass, Men's Fancy, Men's Straight, Women's Southern Cloth, Women's Jingle Dress and Women's Fancy Shawl."

Goodson said Rose Hill was chosen to perform because each dance style can be represented, and viewers can learn how each dance originates.

"The main goal of the Rose Hill Dance Troupe is to educate people of all races and ages on Native American culture, dancing and regalia," Goodson said.

> "THE MAIN GOAL OF THE ROSE HILL DANCE TROUPE IS TO EDUCATE PEOPLE OF ALL RACES AND AGES ON NATIVE AMERICAN CULTURE, DANCING AND REGALIA."
> TAMMY GOODSON
> NASB president

She said the group is named after Rose Hill, a small community southeast of Cushing, Okla. The Troupe has existed for five years with Josh Williamson as its manager and has performed in Kansas, Oklahoma and Texas.

Goodson said that every year during Heritage Month, NASB tries to bring in speakers, dancers and artists to educate people about American Indian culture.

"The NASB wanted to have an exhibition to preview the NASB's 10th Annual Spring Pow Wow. The Spring Pow Wow will highlight competition dancing and honor all K-State Native American Alumni," Goodson said.

The powwow will be from 1 to 10 p.m. Saturday at Ahearn Field House.

State court considers sex offender law

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The Kansas Supreme Court was asked Tuesday to rule that making a person's criminal history public under the state's Sexual Offenders Registration Act is unconstitutional.

But Attorney General Carla Stovall said the 1993 law should be upheld because its purpose is to protect the public, not punish the person who committed the crime.

"It's simply to protect by giving information," Stovall said. "It's not to shame or humiliate anybody."

At issue is the case of Clifford A. Scott, placed on two years' probation in Shawnee County on a 1995 charge of attempted aggravated sexual battery. The state's highest court is expected to rule on the case on May 29.

Previously, the Court of Appeals said unrestricted public access to the registration information required by the registration law is grossly disproportionate to the crime. Stovall said the appeals court erred in its ruling.

In arguing the law should be struck down, Scott's attorney, Rick Kittel, said his client was placed on probation and that "unrestricted public access is punitive in nature."

He said the law makes no effort to determine whether a person is likely to commit another sex crime before requiring the 10-year registration with law enforcement officials.

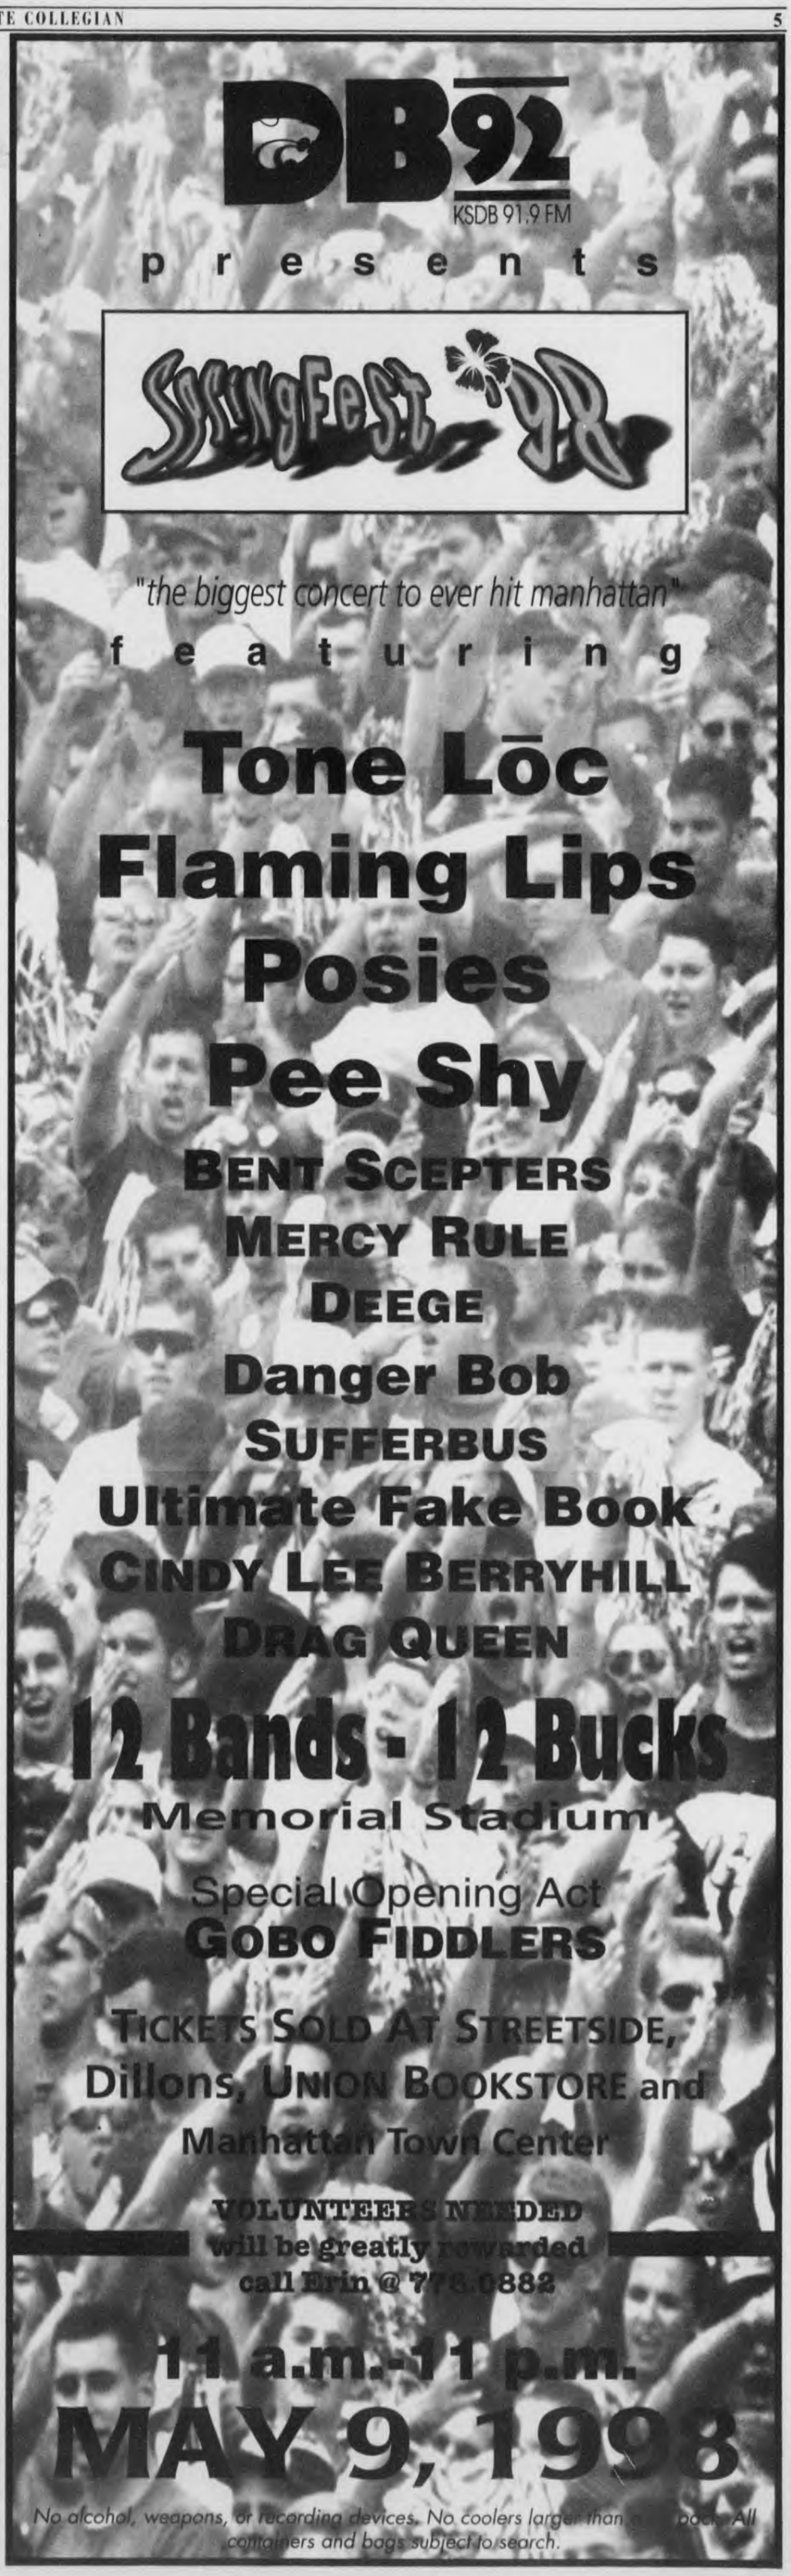
"The issue isn't whether there is a name on a list, but whether it should be released to the public," Kittel said.

Kittel said the law envisioned the information being available from a sheriff's office for the asking, but instead it is featured on the Internet and available to anyone with a computer.

"The same punishment is being imposed for minor crimes and serious crimes," Kittel said. "It operates against everybody, even those who aren't likely to re-offend."

Kittel also said those required to register face public ridicule and are subject to people taking the law into their own hands.

He suggested the Supreme Court mandate a separate hearing to determine whether a person should be required to register.



"If the person doesn't present a threat, there is no need to subject them to scorn and ridicule," Kittel said.

But Stovall told the court the Kansas Legislature wanted those convicted of sex crimes to register and didn't include a hearing requirement in the statute it enacted. She also said the state doesn't publicize the names.

"We don't go door to door. We simply have a list," Stovall said. "The purpose is protect the public, not shame or humiliate anybody."

She also said Scott did beat, kick and punch the woman, and his probation was all the more reason for him to be listed.

"I think he should register, especially since he's out on probation," Stovall said. "It makes registration even that much more important."

NBA denies Knicks protest of last-second shot with Miami

NEW YORK — The NBA dealt the New York Knicks another loss Tuesday, refusing to reverse a bad call on a last-second shot that would have won a crucial game in their playoff run.

Commissioner David Stern admitted the referees made a mistake by waving off Allan Houston's shot in the Knicks' 82-81 loss to the rival Miami Heat on Sunday. But he determined it was a judgment call, not a misapplication of rules, and was therefore irreversible.

The NBA does not have a replay rule that would allow referees to check videotape to correct a blown call.

"Until it does so, such is not the function of the league office," Stern said.

The ruling on the Knicks' protest came less than an hour before they began their game against the Washington Wizards at Madison Square Garden. New York lost 104-102, blowing a chance to move back into seventh place in the Eastern Conference after New Jersey lost at home to Toronto.

The Knicks need to win one of their final two games to clinch the playoffs.

New York would prefer to finish seventh in the conference, thereby avoiding a first-round matchup with the defending champion Chicago Bulls. The seventh-seeded team will play Miami in the first round.

"We felt that we were in the right on this and had a game clearly taken away from us," Knicks general manager Ernie Grunfeld said. "But we obviously have no recourse now and have to move forward and concentrate on the rest of these games.

"Justice will be served by us getting into the seventh spot on our own, doing the best we can and winning these last three games," he said.

Earlier in the day Miami coach Pat Riley said he was tired of the controversy.

"Give them their game," he said before the ruling. "They're whining and crying about some game. Give it to them and let's play (in the playoffs). If they want it that bad, we'll be here."

Knicks coach Jeff Van Gundy seemed to be taken aback by the harshness of Riley's comment.

"Anybody who would make a comment like that does not understand how hard of an effort we made in that game," Van Gundy said. "We all know that the last team they want to play is us. Right now, that looks to be a slim chance."

The Knicks had argued that a technical malfunction — the early illumination of a red light behind the basket with one-tenth of a second left — could have caused referees to wave off Houston's basket.

By doing so, it appeared the Knicks were trying to get around the NBA rule that states, "Regardless of when the horn or red light operates to signify the end of a period, the officials ultimately make the final decision whether to allow or disallow a successful field goal."

But in making its decision, the NBA essentially disregarded that line of argument and said it all came down to the referees' judgment.

This is the second time in less than a year the Knicks have been on the short end of a controversy involving the Miami Heat.

Larry Johnson, Patrick Ewing and Allan Houston were suspended after leaving the bench during a fight at the end of Game 5 of the Knicks' second-round series against the Heat last year. No Miami players left the bench during the melee, and the Heat went on to win the series.

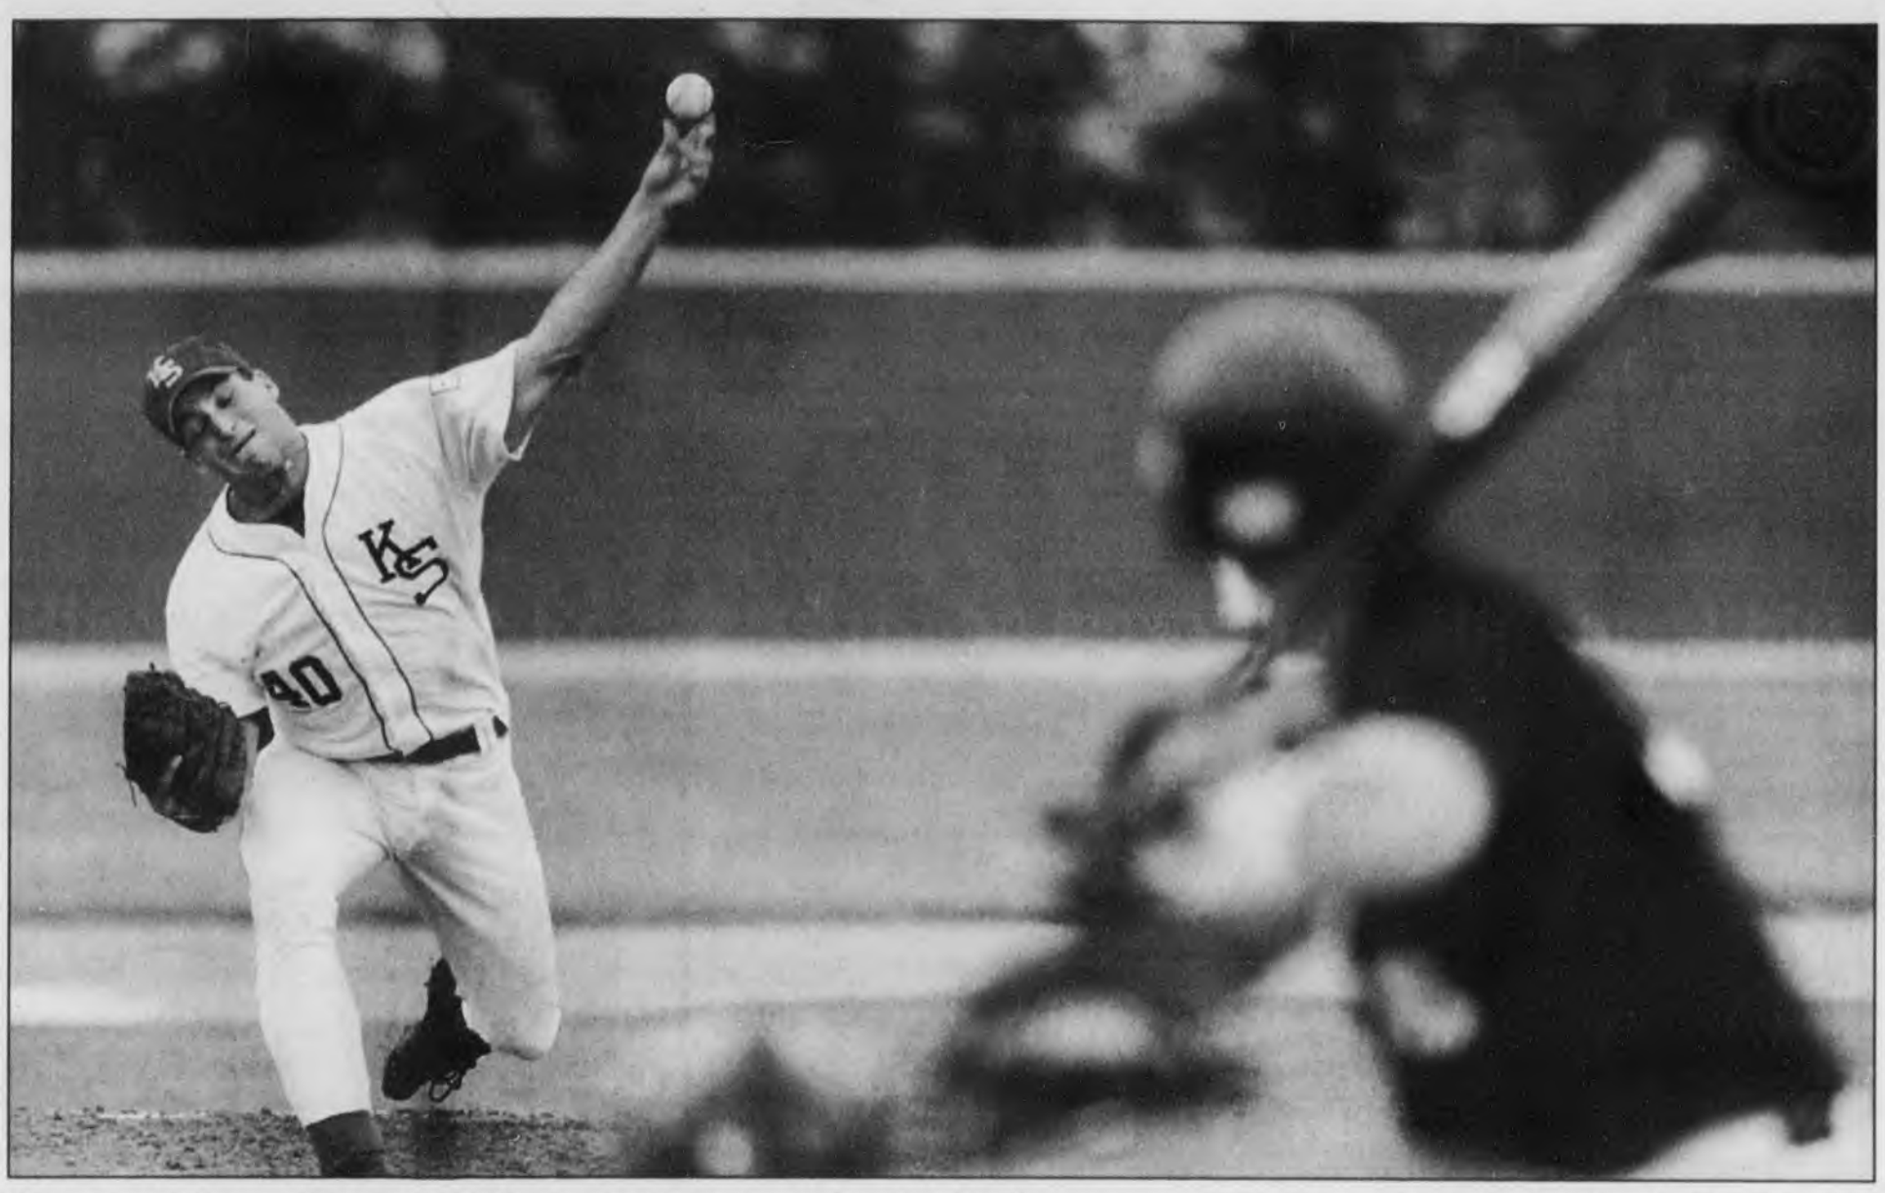
The latest disputed finish in Miami began after New York inbounded at midcourt with 4.4 seconds left. Chris Mills took the pass and drove past Alonzo Mourning, but missed a short runner. Charles Oakley missed a tip, and Dan Majerle then slapped the ball in the direction of Houston, who hastily threw up one last attempt at the buzzer.

Replays showed the ball leaving Houston's hand with 0.2 seconds remaining, but referee Bob Delaney waved the basket off. The outcome stood after the officials huddled for some 30 seconds. The officials didn't see a videotape until they were in their dressing room.

Before learning the Knicks protest had been denied, Van Gundy called for the league to adopt a replay rule.

"Whether or not it's done right here this time, let's at least admit that it's a potential problem," Van Gundy said. "I think the commissioner should say 'From now on ... '

"What if this had happened in a playoff game or the deciding game of a playoff series, or heaven forbid, a Bulls game?"



If the outcome had been changed, it would be the first time in more than 15 years a protest was upheld.

In 1982-83, the final three seconds of a Lakers-Spurs game were replayed after San Antonio successfully argued that an incorrect call was made on a double-lane violation when Lakers guard Norm Nixon faked a free throw and caused players from both teams to enter the lane.

Referee Jack Madden called for a jump ball, the Lakers made a last-second shot and the game went into double-overtime, with Los Angeles eventually winning 137-132.

San Antonio protested that because the ball never left Nixon's hands, the players should have been repositioned to await the foul shot.

Commissioner Larry O'Brien agreed, and the final three seconds were replayed 4 1/2 months later, with the Spurs winning 117-114 in regulation.

K-STATE PITCHER TOM HENSHAW THROWS A PITCH TO A FORT HAYS STATE BATTER TUESDAY EVENING AT FRANK MYERS FIELD. HENSHAW THREW FOUR INNINGS AND STRUCK OUT THREE BATTERS. FORT HAYS BEAT THE CATS 10-9.

The K-State baseball team hit a brick wall Tuesday night. After succumbing to No. 10 Oklahoma over the weekend, the Cats were looking to ink one in the win column against Fort Hays State, but instead they ended up in a game of

Hard ball

STORY BY JEREMY L. KELLEY • PHOTO BY IVAN KOZAR

A frustrated Andy Silva blared a four-letter expletive that bellowed through the air moments after the team huddle in center field just after the K-State baseball team lost to Fort Hays State 10-9 Tuesday night at Frank Myers Field.

Frustration pretty much summed up the game.

The Tigers came back from a two-run deficit and beat K-State in the ninth inning.

With the score knotted at nine apiece, Tiger second baseman Steve Ysac walked and then stole second. Ysac advanced to third on a throwing error by K-State catcher Yancy Ayres.

Silva retired the next two batters, and it looked as if K-State would escape the inning without giving up a run. However, Fort Hays catcher Chad Sigg hit a line drive just past diving third baseman Josh Marn, and Ysac scored to give the Tigers the win.

"It's frustrating, because we really didn't need something like this to happen," head coach Mike Clark said. "We just let them hang around too long."

K-State had several scoring opportunities in the early part of the game. The Cats left three on base in the third inning and two in the second.

"We didn't execute early offensively," Clark said. "We just couldn't bust it loose. Early in the ballgame we had a chance to put some big numbers up, and I think that allowed them to stay in the ballgame."

The Cats actually had to come from behind themselves. Down 4-3 in the fourth inning, left fielder Brian Bobier hit a double to left center field that scored second baseman Chad Tabor and center fielder Eric Sommerhauser, who extended his hitting streak to nine games with a chopper to the short stop that inning.

Fort Hays added three more runs in the fifth — a three-run homer by third baseman Matt Muller that barely cleared the wall in left field.

"That was a gold shot," Clark said. "How that got over, I have no idea."

Again the Cats came back and added four runs. Silva reached on an error by the shortstop, as did designated hitter Kasey Weishaar. Both runners advanced on Tabor's sacrifice bunt to the pitcher.

Shortstop J.D. Loudabarger hit a sacrifice fly to center field that scored Silva. Ayres walked and took second on a wild pitch. Sommerhauser reached on an error by the second baseman. Moments later Weishaar scored on a wild pitch. Bobier hit a line drive to left field and scored Ayres and Sommerhauser, and the Cats were up 9-7.

But after that, things fell apart, and the Tigers scored two runs in the eighth and the go-ahead run in the ninth.

Clark said there were some positives he could take out of the game.

"We had some kids hit the ball good — Brian Bobier," he said. "You don't just want to shut off everything. This is one of those games you wish you were a track coach. You can sit there and talk about three or four great events and not have to tell everybody that you lost the game."

Bobier was one of the bright spots accounting for five of K-State's seven RBIs. Bobier went 3-5 with two doubles.

Starter Tom Henshaw went four innings giving up five earned runs. Henshaw struck out three batters and also walked three. Pat Hertzel came on in relief in the fifth inning and pitched three innings, striking out five and giving up three runs. Silva was dealt the loss, however, suffering his first blown save opportunity of the year. Silva is now 1-1.

The Cats are back in action today against the Bethany Terrible Swedes at 4 p.m. at Frank Myers Field. K-State leads the all-time series against Bethany 29-3.

Blue Jays topple Royals; Guzman gets victory allowing 4 hits

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Juan Guzman kept Kansas City to four hits in seven innings and got his first victory in almost a year Tuesday night as the Toronto Blue Jays beat the Royals 5-1.

Guzman (1-2) had been 0-7 in his nine previous starts going back to an injury-plagued 1997. In his last start, he had given up 10 runs for the first time in his seven-year career and lost 13-2 at Minnesota.

Guzman, who last won on May 8, 1997, at Cleveland, struck out six and walked one in his longest outing of the year.

Pat Rapp (0-1) allowed four hits and three earned runs in six innings, striking out two and walking four. In three starts covering 20 innings, the Royals have supported Rapp with five runs while he has given up just four earned runs.

Paul Quantrill pitched the last two innings for his first save.

The Royals finished with just five hits in a game that ended in a heavy rain. There was a 44-minute rain delay in the third inning.

After the Blue Jays went ahead 2-1 in the fifth, Darrin Fletcher made it 4-1 with a two-run double in the sixth.

Alex Gonzalez broke a 1-for-29 skid by hitting Rapp's 3-2 pitch over the left-field wall for his first home run in the fifth.

Shawn Green hit his fifth home run for Toronto.

Royals shortstop Felix Martinez, who made 37 errors last year in the minors, committed his first two miscues as a major leaguer to let the Blue Jays score an unearned run following Gonzalez's homer.

Shannon Stewart grounded to Martinez, whose throw to first was in the dirt. Stewart wound up at second and scored when Martinez misplayed Jose Canseco's grounder.

Shane Mack's RBI single scored Kansas City's run in the second.

Top 40 reasons baseball is better than football: the short list

As Ol' Blue Eyes once sang, spring is here. Only two weeks into their season, however, baseball fans rudely were jostled out of relaxation by the incessant buzz surrounding spring football (an oxymoron if ever there was one) and the always-overblown NFL draft.

Before we swat this annoying bug away for a few more months, let us first consider the myriad reasons why baseball remains the superior of the two sports.

VIEWPOINT

Byron is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Byron at byronv@ksu.edu.

Remember, this list is merely the writer's opinion. If it offends you, then it is someone else's opinion. Drum roll, please.

1. "It ain't over 'til it's over" is much catchier than "It ain't over 'til the clock runs out and the final gun goes off."

2. In baseball, you don't have to wait a week or two between your favorite team's games.

3. Deion Sanders still plays football.

4. You get to keep a baseball that lands in the stands; you have to give a football back.

5. Self-proclaimed "draft expert" Mel Kiper Jr. is a phenomenon exclusive to football.

6. In baseball, a team doesn't get penalized when a player removes his headwear.

7. Miami Hurricanes baseball. Miami Hurricanes football. Enough said.

8. Baseball fans don't need the players to tell them when to cheer louder.

9. Where does a catcher put his hands? Now where does a quarterback put his hands?

10. Game 6 of the 1986 World Series.

11. Baseball players don't stand on the sidelines and hold hands during key moments of the game.

12. In baseball, it actually matters which stadium you play in because of varying field dimensions. Every football field is exactly the same (except for the one where Jimmy Hoffa is buried in the end zone).

13. Football combines the two worst aspects of American life: violence and committee meetings.

14. Baseball has "Take Me Out to the Ball Game." Football has the "Grease-Medley Halftime Extravaganza."

15. In baseball, you don't have to wait five minutes while referees discuss whether a spectacular play will count.

16. Baseball's All-Star Game actually means something.

17. Baseball has no equivalent to the Poulan/Weed Eater Independence Bowl or the Insight.com Bowl or the Motor City Bowl or the Aloha Bowl or the ... (write in your favorite worthless college bowl game here).

18. Remember that time in 1994 when Nebraska came to K-State and K-State fans started yelling "Overrated" and throwing oranges onto the field? That's another reason.

19. Two letters: O.J.

20. Best baseball movie: "The Natural" starring Robert Redford. Best football movie: "Necessary Roughness" starring Sinbad.

21. Baseball coaches don't get elevated to God status when they win eight games.

22. You don't have to have season tickets to attend a baseball game.

23. Three minutes of action packed into three hours is still better than two minutes of action packed into four hours.

24. Frank Gifford doesn't call baseball games

25. (Left blank in honor of Mark McGwire's jersey number).

26. In baseball, you can't run a few plays up the middle to burn out the clock. You have to throw the ball over the plate and make the other team beat you.

27. "How 'bout them Cowboys!"

28. Baseball players don't use the opposing team's colors as war paint.

29. You know those guys who show up at football games with their enormous guts painted in team colors and who simultaneously yell obscenities, eat nachos and drink beer until they have heart attacks, only to refuse medical attention for fear of missing a snap? That's another reason.

30. Baseball fans don't need John Madden and a telestrator to explain to them what just happened.

31. You don't have to be James Bond to decipher baseball statistics.

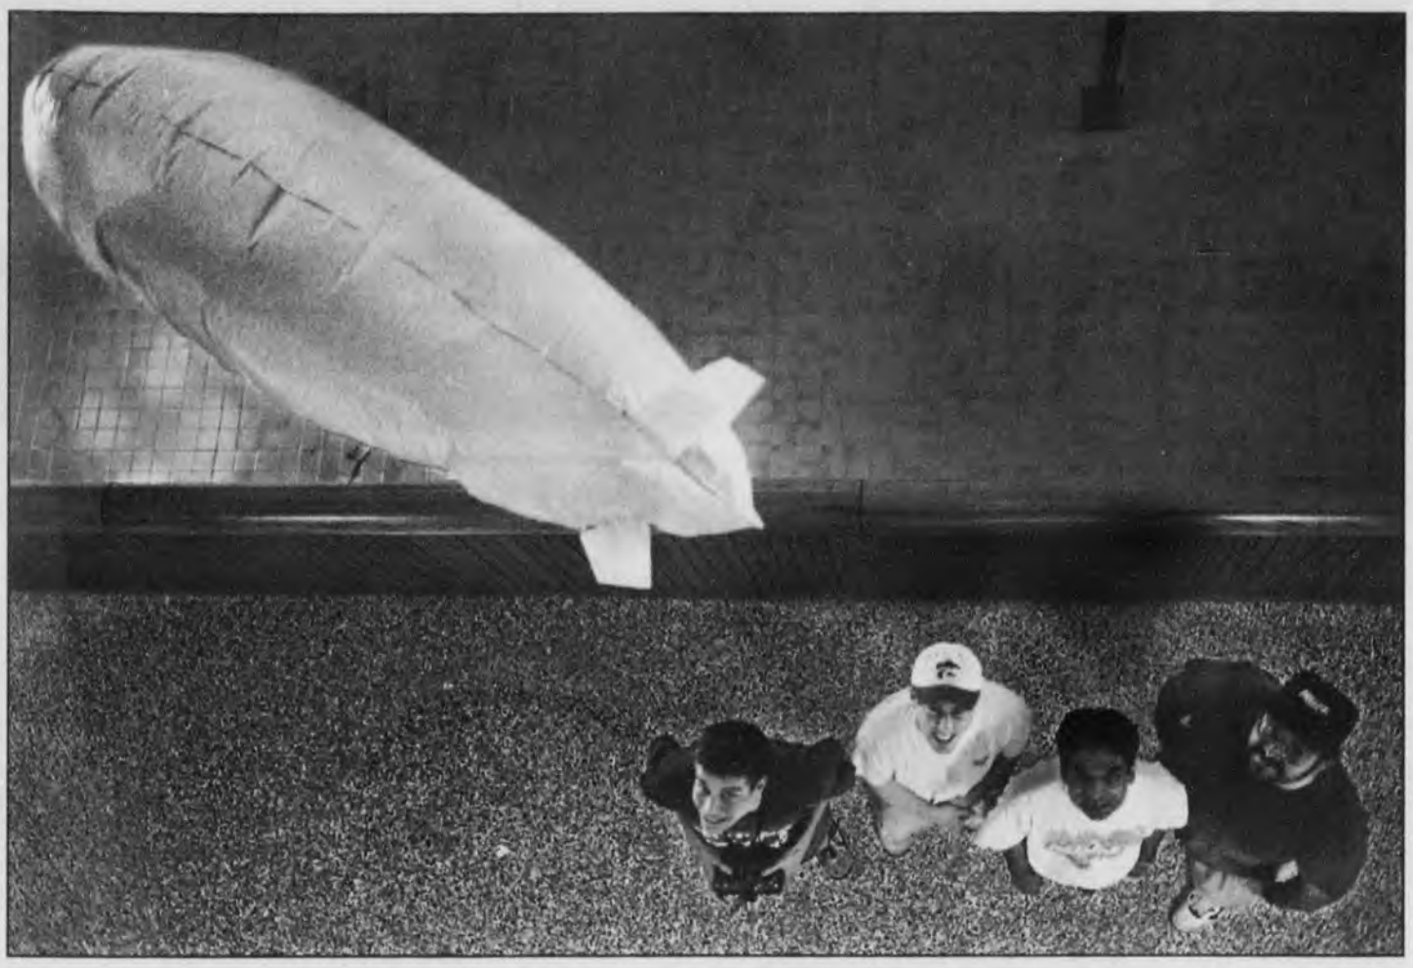
32. Baseball players don't dance after EVERY ... SINGLE ... PLAY!

33. People don't watch baseball's championship game just to see the commercials.

34. The Buffalo Bills can't lose the World Series.

35. Baseball fans at least know the state in which their favorite team plays its home games (See: Notre Dame).

36. Baseball fans don't take up eight extra parking spaces with propane grills and buffet tables.



37. Football is waaaaay too specialized. What kid grows up wanting to be a third-down-and-long-yardage pulling guard?

38. Baseball fans take off their shirts only when it's hot, not because they have a rendezvous with pneumonia.

39. College baseball's national championship is determined on the field. College football's national championship is determined at a ballot box.

And finally:

40. Baseball makes me think of my dad, my grandpa and beautiful summer nights. Football makes me think of Reggie White.

JEFF GRANT, LEFT, JUNIOR IN MECHANICAL ENGINEERING; MIKE GRIMM, SENIOR IN MECHANICAL ENGINEERING; JEEVAN PADIYAR, SENIOR IN CHEMISTRY, BIOLOGY, AND PRE-MEDICINE; AND DANNY WHITE, SENIOR IN ELECTRICAL ENGINEERING, ALL OF WHOM ARE OFFICERS OF THE K-STATE CHAPTER OF THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF AERONAUTICS AND ASTRONAUTICS, FLY THE CLUB BLIMP IN DURLAND HALL.

KSU students create blimp to advertise events

AMY BICKEL
Kansas State Collegian

Visitors who passed through Durland Hall during the All-University Open House on April 3 might have seen a remote-control helium balloon hovering overhead.

Members of the American Institute of Aeronautics and Astronautics demonstrated the blimp balloon project to parents, students and future K-Staters to help get their name out across campus.

Danny White, senior in electrical engineering, said he came up with the balloon idea, which struck him after he attended a convention that also had a balloon.

"The K.C. Blades also have a blimp balloon," said Jeevan Padiyar, club president and senior in chemistry, biochemistry and pre-medicine.

"This can give us exposure because it's new and exciting, and not many have done something like this."

Last fall, AIAA approached the Engineering College Council about funding for the project. Members then went to the Student Governing Association and received approval. Construction of the balloon began in January.

Except for the mylar blimp bag, the balloon was made from scratch and is 8 feet long and 5 feet in circumference. It cost $260 to build.

White said many people at Open House seemed impressed by the balloon and how it worked.

"It was even requested for us to bring it back next year by Dean Hightower (assistant dean of engineering)," he said. "This project has given us the best response and exposure so far."

Jeff Grant, junior in mechanical engineering and vice president of the club, said he also received good comments from visitors during Open House.

"The balloon accomplished our original goal, which was to get more recognition to our organization," Grant said.

Besides gaining recognition, one of the reasons for the balloon project was to set up a video camera connected to the balloon and project activities during open house onto a TV screen. Visitors then would have been able to have a better view of events through the big crowds.

Because of backorders, the camera will not be installed until next year. The club also plans to use the camera to take aerial shots of sporting events in Bramlage Coliseum.

The camera will have audio capability and will be able to broadcast its signal to any television within the complex.

Although the club does not have plans for the balloon this spring, in the fall it plans to use it to advertise other university functions, such as the Activities Carnival. Members also want to take it around to area schools to get the students interested in K-State and engineering, Padiyar said.

"If anybody wants to request our services to advertise on the blimp, they are welcome to contact me," Padiyar said.

Another project the club plans to do next year is to purchase a flight simulator for training students to fly during the winter.

"Anybody with an interest in designing and building radio-control crafts or aviation flying can join," Padiyar said.

New K-State photography club looking for members

BRENNA TALLEY
Kansas State Collegian

There is now an outlet for those who desire to do more than use point-and-shoot cameras. A photography club has been started at K-State.

The club cannot be registered officially with the University Activities Board until a mission statement is written, officers are elected and a name is chosen, but plans for local photo opportunities as well as a trip to Mardi Gras in New Orleans next year are in the works.

Kerry Coppin, assistant professor of art and adviser to the club, said he encourages a creative environment for photography on campus in order to help students who would not have the opportunity to learn about photography otherwise.

"I think the club would be useful for anyone with enthusiasm in photography. It's the students' club. Activities and opportunities are their decision," he said.

Marla Sherrill, junior in fine arts and art education, took a photography class and was on her high school yearbook photography staff, but she did not get involved in developing pictures.

Sherrill said people can learn about themselves and the world in general through photography, whether people look at it as art, a hobby or as a career like photojournalism.

Scott Hussey, junior in graphic design, said he thinks the club should increase the overall level of knowledge of photography on campus, because all it takes to be a member is an interest in photography.

"Someone who doesn't know a lot can learn to develop, print and go to places to see shows in the area and far away," Hussey said.

Although there are no prerequisites for membership, such as being a photography student or having experience, dues are required.

Sherrill said a $10 membership fee would entitle members to more than just darkroom usage and would allow them to go on trips and attend speeches the club is planning.

The darkroom fee helps pay for chemicals the club uses in developing photos.

The club meets in the Willard Hall darkroom Monday nights at 9 p.m.

Supreme Court, governor refuse to delay execution

ASSOCIATED PRESS

RICHMOND, Va. — Despite requests from Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and the World Court, Gov. Jim Gilmore refused Tuesday night to block the execution of a Paraguayan man who fatally stabbed a woman.

Gilmore's order that the execution proceed came even as lawyers for 32-year-old Angel Francisco Breard and Paraguay tried a last-minute appeal in the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Breard was executed by injection Tueday night.

Earlier in the day the U.S. Supreme Court, in a 6-3 decision, refused to stop the execution.

The World Court ruled last week that the execution should be blocked because Virginia authorities failed to notify Paraguay of Breard's arrest as required by an international treaty, the Vienna Convention.

In Tuesday's unsigned opinion, the Supreme Court said Breard failed to assert his claim in state court that the treaty had been violated, and therefore lost his right to raise that issue in federal court.

Breard was not informed of his right to seek help from his country's embassy when he was arrested for the 1992 murder and attempted rape of Ruth Dickie in Arlington.

Rulings by the World Court, a 15-member United Nations tribunal, are not binding. The court wanted the execution delayed while its judges decide if Breard deserved a new trial.

Albright joined the debate Monday night, asking Gilmore to delay the execution because she was concerned that the case could jeopardize the safety of Americans arrested in other countries.

"The execution of Mr. Breard in the present circumstances could lead some countries to contend incorrectly that the U.S. does not take seriously its obligations under the Convention," Albright wrote in a letter to Gilmore.

Albright said Tuesday that although Breard was convicted of a heinous crime, she intervened because "we need to make clear there are foreign policy aspects."

Gilmore had said he shared Albright's concern about the safety of Americans abroad, but "I'm also concerned about the safety of the people of Virginia. ... People are entitled to know they will be safe in their homes."

Both Virginia's attorney general and the U.S. Justice Department recommended to the Supreme Court the execution be allowed to proceed.

Virginia Senior Assistant Attorney General Donald Curry argued in a brief that Breard's appeal would cast the Supreme Court "in the subservient role of some sort of enforcement arm" of the World Court.

Virginia officials have acknowledged they failed to inform Breard, 32, of his right under the Vienna Convention to contact the Paraguayan consulate for assistance. But the Justice Department said in its Supreme Court brief that the error was "no basis for requiring the undoing of the lawfully imposed sentence of the courts of Virginia."

Breard was convicted of stabbing Dickie, a 39-year-old neighbor, five times on Feb. 17, 1992. He told police he intended to rape her, but ran away when he heard someone knock on the door. Breard moved to the U.S. in 1986.

Paraguay and Breard's lawyers contend that if he had been allowed to contact the consulate, he would have been advised to accept a plea agreement that would have spared his life. U.S. authorities deny such an offer was made.

Arthur Karp, the assistant prosecutor who handled the case, said Breard had ample help from his lawyers and Paraguay did not raise any concerns at the time.

"It's difficult to believe anybody in the embassy cared," he said. "It was in all the newspapers."

Robert Tomlinson, one of Breard's two attorneys, said his client "made choices against the advice of his attorneys and other people close to him."

It was the second time in seven months that a foreign government had tried to stop a Virginia execution because of a treaty violation. Mario Benjamin Murphy was executed Sept. 17 over objections from Mexico. The State Department also had pressured then-Gov. George Allen to stop 1992, she led NOW's Global Feminist Conference, which included women from more than 45 countries.

She will be available after the lecture for a book-signing session. The K-State Union Bookstore will be selling two of Ireland's books, "What Women Want" and "Ethics of Change" in the McCain lobby.

Becky Wilson, event coordinator and member of the Union Program Council Issues and Ideas Committee, one of several organizations sponsoring the event, said the organizations were lucky to have Ireland speak at K-State.

"She just happened to be coming through the area already," Wilson said. "It's not every day students get to see a nationally known figure."

Manhattan expansion to combine residential, business atmosphere and high densities butting up against vacant lots. He said neighborhoods could organize to spearhead the creation of historic districts that could focus on improvements.

Before new residential development occurs, however, some said they thought the city could do a better job of identifying what makes its neighborhoods successful.

"The private sector needs to accept more responsibility for being sensitive to how their development fits into a neighborhood," said Tom Phillips, chairman of the planning board and a private planning consultant. "Public leaders are going to have to allow the private sector to be more creative with projects to bring in a different type of housing."

Phillips, who has facilitated public discussions on the city's neighborhoods, said he believes the Comprehensive Plan could go further in helping the city promote neighborhood revitalization. A pamphlet he hands out at meetings suggests the plan could include more specific points such as neighborhood design principles, citizen planning-group initiatives and site planning tools.

The TIF zone

In 1997, the city approved a "tax increment financing" district in the area bounded by Pierre Street on the north, railroad tracks on the south, Juliette Avenue on the west and the Kansas Highway 177 bridge on the east. The plan uses the increased tax revenue from the higher property values derived from new development as a source for redevelopment funds.

In short, a base tax level is set and any increase goes into the fund. The move by the city was seen as a way to dress up what is for many the gateway to the city.

The area as it exists now is a mix of open residential and commercial lots. With the addition of the Fairfield Inn, the character of the area is changing.

"The TIF district is an area where we want a plan developed," said Bruce Snead, Manhattan mayor and former planning board member. "A plan has to be flexible. It's not a zoning document. Is the Fairfield Inn ideal if we could have our druthers? Maybe not, but somebody wanted to invest a significant amount of money into a known quantity into the downtown. Just because it might not be compatible with the old doesn't mean what's there is sacrosanct and needs to be preserved."

He said the Fairfield Inn project is likely to be focused on by developers who may be interested in investing in downtown.

"Ideally, the city would like to foster that without sponsoring that," Snead said.

Attracting residents

Although no large tracts of open land exist in the downtown area, some see the patchwork of vacant lots as possibilities for residential development. But there aren't residents clamoring for a piece of downtown property compared with the amount of new housing being built on the city's fringes.

"We need to bring people who like cities back into the city," said Ray Weisenburger, a member of the planning board for 18 years, serving twice as chair, and associate dean of the College of Architecture, Planning and Design.

Because no recent downtown projects have focused on residential development, the form a development could take is still unidentified. The introduction of a suburban aesthetic isn't favored by any planner.

"The real issue is, how do we get people in a higher density with all the privacy they need in Manhattan without extending it into the country," he said.

Weisenburger is one of the few city planners who criticizes the Fairfield Inn project.

Although most in the city characterize the hotel as new hope for a blighted area, he attributes it with weakening the urban form of downtown.

"What we have in mind is a hotel like the Wareham with parking hidden away and the Fairfield people are inserting a suburban hotel on the site," he said.

TOP 10 NEWS STORIES
Kansas State Collegian

What were the biggest stories of the school year?

It depends on your criteria, of course, and your perspective. Here are our choices from fall and spring, based on reader interest, amount of coverage, long-term implications and old-fashioned newsworthiness. All these things help make a big story big.

Your job is to pick the top 10 stories from this list of 20. Put a check by the 10 stories you think affected K-State the most this school year (there's no need to rank them). If you want to review the stories, go to the World Wide Web address directly after each title.

There are four ways to vote:

1. Cut out this form and bring it to the Collegian newsroom, Kedzie 116.

2. Cut out this form and mail it to News Editor, Kansas State Collegian, Kedzie 103, Manhattan, KS 66506.

3. Send an e-mail with your picks (use the letters A, B, etc.) to top10@spub.ksu.edu.

4. Point your World Wide Web browser to collegian.ksu.edu/top10/, and fill out the survey from your computer.

☐ A. Students get new K-State IDs
collegian.ksu.edu/top10/card.html

It serves as identification, a residence hall key, meal card, check card and more. But the Wildcat Card system implemented this year had its share of troubles. According to one Wildcat Card official, at least 3,500 of the new cards had to be recalled. In addition, Commerce Bank made itself a prominent figure in campus banking by making the card a full-featured debit card.

☐ B. Colbert Hills to offer education collegian.ksu.edu/top10/colbert.html

Jim Colbert, a 1964 alumnus of K-State and a PGA Senior Tour player, began surveying the area around Manhattan in spring 1994. More than three years later, the area chosen for what will become Colbert Hills Golf Course was recommended for rezoning by the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board. The project is well under way for development as K-State's own golf course.

☐ C. Hale Library welcomed by students collegian.ksu.edu/top10/hale.html

K-State welcomed its newest addition, Hale Library, the afternoon of Oct. 6. Farrell Library officially became Hale Library during a dedication ceremony outside the library's southwest entrance.

☐ D. Commission rejects Cohen-Esrey collegian.ksu.edu/top10/cohen.html

The Manhattan City Commission rejected Cohen-Esrey's Planned Unit Development annexation proposal for the Northview neighborhood in a 5-0 vote in late October. The development would have created low- and middle-income housing.

☐ E. Students vote down stadium fee collegian.ksu.edu/top10/stadium.html

The student body referendum vote on whether to create a student privilege fee to help expand KSU Stadium failed in November. The measure, which needed 60-percent approval to pass, received 1,793 votes, or 49 percent of the total. Fifty-one percent of student voters, 1,892 students, voted against the creation of a fee.

☐ F. Senators pass health fee collegian.ksu.edu/top10/health.html

Student Senate approved 39-16 a 4-percent increase in the Student Health Privilege Fee. The bill changed the amount of the fee to $2,607,659.

☐ G. Cats win the Fiesta Bowl collegian.ksu.edu/top10/fiesta.html

The 27th Tostitos Fiesta Bowl — K-State's first-ever Alliance Bowl — ended with the Cats over Syracuse 35-18. The win, which was probably the biggest in the 102 years of K-State football, capped the first 11-win season in school history.

☐ H. TCI adds Spanish flair to lineup collegian.ksu.edu/top10/univision.html

K-State students in Spanish classes will have another resource for classes and extra credit. For five years, Hispanic American Leadership Organization petitioned for Univision, a Spanish cable network, to be added to the TCI of Kansas cable system. It wasn't until last semester that members took big steps to bring Univision to Manhattan, said Leo Prieto, HALO president.

☐ I. Fire in the 'Ville collegian.ksu.edu/top10/fire.html

The Feb. 14 morning fire that enveloped the 1100 block of Moro Street was contained to two buildings. Both buildings were destroyed. The fire was reported to the Manhattan Fire Department at 3:42 a.m. Crews arrived on the scene four minutes later, but the buildings that housed Greek's Pizzeria, Club Karrington and Adventure Travel International were destroyed by the fire. No one was injured.

☐ J. Athletes arrested in Aggieville collegian.ksu.edu/top10/athletes.html

Two of K-State's top athletes were arrested in February in two unrelated incidents. Quarterback Michael Bishop was cleared of all charges, including battery. Basketball forward Manny Dies will go to trial on May 7 for transporting an open container and obstruction of the legal process.

☐ K. Alumni building coming to campus collegian.ksu.edu/top10/alumni.html

The KSU Alumni Association found a new home in the area south of Memorial Stadium. However, controversy continued about design and the lack of campus input.

☐ L. Livestock-judging team wins again collegian.ksu.edu/top10/livestock.html

The K-State football team has never done it, neither has the basketball team. But the livestock judging team has. President Jon Wefald gave a luncheon for the four-time national livestock-judging championship team — the only team at K-State to win that many consecutive national championships.

☐ M. KSU Rodeo bucks into Weber Hall collegian.ksu.edu/top10/rodeo.html

Twenty-five K-State students competed in this year's KSU Rodeo out of the 524 contestants who came from colleges across Kansas, Missouri and Oklahoma. It was the 42nd year the rodeo had come to K-State.

☐ N. Enhancements planned for Union collegian.ksu.edu/top10/union.html

With an increase in commercialization and a scheduled remodeling, the K-State Student Union will have a substantial facelift in the next few years. Additions such as well-known fast-food franchises, mall-type vending carts and Commerce Bank have raised the issue of whether the Union is gaining a mall-like atmosphere.

Student Senate defeated 26-26-1 a bill that would have created a privilege fee to fund Hale Library at a meeting in early March. The legislation would have created a $328,000 student fee, about 85 cents per credit hour. It needed 36 votes — a two-thirds majority — to pass.

A rare March blizzard kept Manhattan residents bundled inside, shutting down many city streets and businesses. Those who were brave enough to venture outside were greeted by 40-mph winds and 6-foot snow drifts — all this just two weeks before spring break.

Tracey Mann and Andy Macklin beat out Greg Davis and Jim Boomer for the 1998-99 student body presidential and vice presidential seats. During the campaign, Mann said one significant focus of his administration would be improving academic advising at K-State. Other ideas included the book-swapping system, which would help students trade textbooks with other students instead of paying retail prices. Mann and Macklin said they also will try to create a parking permit for the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Reactions to medicines kill 100,000 Americans annually

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHICAGO — Bad reactions to prescription and over-the-counter medicines kill more than 100,000 Americans and seriously injure an additional 2.1 million every year — far more than most people realize, researchers said.

Such reactions, which do not include prescribing errors or drug abuse, rank at least sixth in the United States among causes of death — behind heart disease, cancer, lung disease, strokes and accidents, said a report based on an analysis of existing studies.

"We're not saying, 'Don't take drugs.' They have wonderful benefits," said Dr. Bruce H. Pomeranz, principal investigator and a neuroscience professor at the University of Toronto.

"But what we're arguing is that there should be increased awareness also of side effects, which until now have not been too well understood."

The harm can range from an allergic reaction to an antibiotic to stomach bleeding from frequent doses of aspirin, Pomeranz said. The study, by Pomeranz and two colleagues at his university, Jason Lazarou and Paul N. Corey, did not explore which medications or illnesses were involved.

The authors analyzed 39 studies of hospital patients from 1966 to 1996. Serious drug reactions affected 6.7 percent of patients overall, and fatal drug reactions affected 0.32 percent, the authors said in today's Journal of the American Medical Association.

In the study, serious injury was defined as being hospitalized, having to extend a hospital stay or suffering permanent disability.

The most surprising result was the large number of deaths, the authors said.

They found adverse drug reactions ranked between fourth and sixth among leading causes of death, depending on whether they used their most conservative or a more liberal estimate.

In 1994, between 76,000 and 137,000 U.S. hospital patients died, and the ballpark estimate is 106,000, Pomeranz said. The low estimate, 76,000 deaths, would put drug reactions at sixth place. The ballpark estimate would put them fourth, he said.

An additional 1.6 million to 2.6 million patients were seriously injured, with the ballpark estimate 2.1 million, he said.

More than two-thirds of the cases involved reactions outside hospitals rather than in hospitals, the authors said.

Experts commended the study but disagreed whether the estimates are on target.

Dr. David W. Bates of Partners Healthcare Systems and Brigham and Women's Hospital in Boston said the estimates might be high. One reason, he said, is that they might overrepresent large medical centers, which treat sicker-than-average patients, who are more prone to reactions.

"Nonetheless, these data are important, and even if the true incidence of adverse drug reactions is somewhat lower than that reported ... it is still high, and much higher than generally recognized," he said in an editorial accompanying the study.

Finally, hospitals should find better ways to track and head off problems, the way a model computerized system does at LDS Hospital in Salt Lake City.

Local pharmacists give advice on buying medications during spring allergy season

BRANDON R. GROSSARDT
Kansas State Collegian

With spring here and summer on its way, students are suffering from hay fever, allergies and various other maladies. But not all ways of coping with this onset of sneezing, coughing and watering eyes are equal.

A recent study attributes the death of more than 100,000 Americans annually to drug reactions. What does this mean for those who need medication?

Gene Capocasale, staff pharmacist at Kmart in Manhattan, said he doesn't want the general public to fear prescription drugs.

"There is more hospitalization when people don't take their drugs than when they do," he said. "I think the most common reactions are allergies. But, sometimes people confuse allergies with their bodies not being able to handle the drugs.

Capocasale said there is always a certain risk with all drugs.

"All people have different reactions to different drugs," he said.

Capocasale also said interaction problems rarely occur as long as people inform their doctors and pharmacists of any and all medications they are taking.

"When someone brings in a new prescription we have their current medications in a computer," he said. "The software has built in interaction information and is usually updated monthly."

Capocasale said people don't understand that publicized cases of trouble with medications are not the entire story. He said for many publicly mentioned cases there are millions of helpful cases concerning the same medication.

Brian Butler, staff pharmacist at the local Dillons Pharmacy on Sarber Lane, said he was concerned with the common practice of filling prescriptions at multiple pharmacies.

"People need to choose one pharmacy," he said.

"There is no way for us to know what the interactions are if we don't know what other medications they are taking."

Even though over-the-counter medications don't seem to be a problem, Capocasale said some can be misleading.

"Advertising may be our biggest enemy," he said. "Some different products change ingredients but keep the same name. This tends to be a problem."

Capocasale said he had some advice that might be the deciding factor in over-the-counter medication selection.

"Know what you are treating and what treats it," he said. "Don't treat a symptom you don't have. Read the ingredients on the box and go from there."

Academic honor system to guard against cheating students in 1999

WYNN DALTON
Kansas State Collegian

Students who are accused of cheating in 1999 will face new consequences.

Faculty Senate unanimously passed the Undergraduate Honor System at its monthly meeting Tuesday night, requiring students to sign a pledge stating they will not cheat.

The honor system calls for students to include the following pledge on all course work, assignments and examinations: "On my honor as a student I have neither given nor received unauthorized aid on this assignment."

Mitch Strauss, professor of clothing, textiles and interior design, prepared the honor system for the Provost's Task Force on Academic Honesty during spring 1996.

Provost James Coffman formed the task force after 72 students were caught cheating on biology assignments five years ago, a scandal that made national headlines.

Since that time, the honor system gained the support of the administration and the students. The final link was the faculty.

Jeff Dougan, former Student Senate chair, said he had reservations about Faculty Senate's approval but was energized by its acceptance of the honor system.

"I think it's fantastic. It's amazing. After two years it passed unanimously. The faculty and the students have joined together to raise the bar, to bring the campus to a new level, to change the culture," he said.

Strauss said this is the first step to getting intense commitment throughout the university.

"This honor system is the chastity for a bigger picture. We need student involvement. We need faculty involvement, and we need commitment. This is just the first step," he said.

Dougan said the honor system will create the Honor Council, which will be composed of both students and faculty appointed by the student body president. This body will handle all official reports of academic dishonesty.

Douglas Benson, faculty senator and associate professor of modern languages, said the passing of the Undergraduate Honor System gives consistency to the way academic dishonesty is handled throughout campus and gives it more visibility rather than just being a buried statement in the catalog.

"It is much more proactive as opposed to now. We're reactive. I think that's a positive step," Benson said.

Strauss said faculty must raise the issue of what is acceptable in a classroom and what is considered cheating.

"We have a lot of work to do, because in my class what my students do in terms of group work may be entirely acceptable, and in your class group work may be cheating. It depends on how we define it in our classrooms. We have to help students avoid getting themselves in a bind," Strauss said.

Dougan said a tremendous amount of work and research has been contributed to the evolution of the honor system.

"We looked at the current culture of institutions on the average across the United States and here," Dougan said. "It was pretty surprising that we found the culture is that it is almost socially acceptable to cheat. That's shocking."

Further research found that the culture among students at honor universities is one where cheating is just not an issue, Dougan said.

"Among honor institutions they call the pervasive culture a community of trust. That's the idea that if you present a higher standard to a student then they will live by that standard. They will raise their behavior to that standard," he said.

ARTIST OSCAR LARMER'S EXHIBIT OF PAINTINGS IS ON DISPLAY AT THE MARIANNA KISTLER BEACH MUSEUM OF ART UNTIL JUNE 14. MUSEUM HOURS ARE FROM 10 A.M. TO 4:30 P.M. TUESDAY THROUGH FRIDAY AND FROM 1 TO 4:30 P.M. SATURDAY AND SUNDAY.

Artist finds happiness in daily life

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Artist Oscar Larmer describes his retrospective show at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art as a diary.

If a diary can be considered a daily window into the mind, then the show that opened last week and continues until June 14 in the art museum's John Helm Memorial Gallery is as rich and important as could be expected of decades of work from one of Kansas' most respected artists. Some artists point to early Kansas artists as inspirational touchstones; chances are with Larmer, he knew them.

Art Review

One of the most influential mentors for Larmer was Wichita artist William Dickerson, subject of a large retrospective last fall at the museum. Larmer studied with Dickerson at the School of the Wichita Art Institution while in high school in his hometown, Wichita. The two were friends until Dickerson's death in 1972.

"I observed a man who could see beauty in the every day. I was taught to see the beauty in nature by Bill Dickerson," Larmer said.

Larmer's retrospective forces us to look at the Kansas landscape in yet another incarnation, albeit one that obviously has changed significantly over the decades. Although he has experimented with many artistic styles over the years, his slow move toward almost total abstraction becomes apparent in the watercolors, prints and oils that line the gallery walls.

An early painting, "Corner Store," oil on canvas (1946), shows Dickerson's influence in the colorful palette, the importance of place and the distinct composition of buildings and trees lining a Wichita street.

Larmer eventually left Wichita for Manhattan in 1956, after getting a degree from the University of Kansas and a master of fine arts from Wichita State University. He taught art at K-State from 1956 until he retired in 1989.

It's somewhat ironic for Larmer to have his work in the Helm gallery because he was hired while Helm was the Department of Art chair.

Although a greater awareness of abstraction is evident in some graduate work Larmer did before coming to K-State, his post-1956 work is what he's perhaps most known for locally. "Mesa," oil on canvas (1960), is a transitional work for Larmer, an abstract landscape of overlapping layers of blue, green and yellow that provide a strong harmonic composition.

"I was interested in simplifying nature and painting the universal," Larmer said.

A mid career work, "Big Sky," watercolor with charcoal on paper (1974), is marked by the voluminous sky of massive abstract cloud shapes — patches, really, of blues and whites. This painting, along with a handful of other 1970s works, almost represents abstract minimalism, which Larmer has attempted during his career.

The clear geometric shapes of his more recent work can be traced back to the work "Sunflower Dump," oil on canvas (1947). This work, done while at KU, is based on the half-circle. Look closely and the seeds of Larmer's abstraction are clearly planted.

If you just stumbled upon the Larmer show after seeing Clarence Morgan's abstract expressionism in the next gallery, you get a sense of what abstraction can accomplish when used by two different artists. For local tastes, perhaps Larmer's abstraction will make more sense than Morgan's non-objective abstraction. Still, what a glorious pair these two shows make.

Larmer might represent an age-old tradition of Kansas landscapists, but the path this artist chose was quite different from his teachers paths. Seeing the landscape abstractly has allowed Larmer to renew his interest in the subject for nearly 50 years.

"It's a matter of if nature is more important to you physically or intrinsically as an artist," Larmer said. "Both ways, you get a different quality."

The sheer joy of this understated artist, especially as he walks through the show with the conviction of a man facing a lifetime's worth of brilliant work, is evident in the way he explains his approach to painting.

"Most of my paintings come from depicting the joy of that day," Larmer said. "It's kind of a reunion between nature and God, but don't get too flowery about that."

Haymaker Hall to sponsor music festival

Haylapalooza
This Saturday local bands will play from 2 to 8 p.m. at the fields across from Haymaker and Moore halls.

CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

Saturday, the Derby Complex will have an Earth Day event that has been in the making all year.

Since the beginning of the semester, Haymaker Hall's Governing Board has been planning the Haylapalooza Festival. Proceeds for the festival will come from T-shirt sales promoting the event and will go toward Greenpeace and the K-State chapter of the Wildlife Society. The motto on the T-shirts will read, "Save the damn planet" on the front and list sponsors on the back.

The event, which more than 1,000 people are expected to attend, will be at the field across from Haymaker and Moore halls from 2 to 8 p.m.

This six-hour showcase of local bands also will include games such as Twister and cow-patty bingo. Those who live in the residence halls have the option of exchanging their Saturday evening meal and eating at the festival. For those who live off-campus, food will be served.

Because of the popularity of the event, Bob O'Bryan, sophomore in civil engineering and Haymaker president, had to turn down five bands who asked to play at the festival.

"It's disappointing I had to turn down the bands, but at the same time it makes me feel good that this event is so popular," O'Bryan said.

Scheduled bands for the day will include NASA's Little Secret, Binge, Burgundy Trail, the Black Water, Shocks of Mighty, the Bedpans and Crooked Pinky.

HGB, which meets every Tuesday evening at 9:30, has worked since January to bring everything together for the festival. Specific committees were formed to handle the different aspects of planning.

The committees include the Entertainment Committee, the Games Committee, the Food Committee and the Publicity Committee. Each member of HGB, including executive board members and floor presidents, was assigned to work on one of the committees. O'Bryan said it is their hard work that is making the event possible.

"I'm really excited this group of guys organized this event," he said. "I think their hard work will pay off. I'm proud everyone's been able to follow through with it."

Michael Elder, junior in agronomy and Haymaker vice president, said he saw the event as a promotion for the residence halls.

"This event will show off the Derby Complex very well," Elder said. "I'd definitely want to do something like this next year."

All sponsors of Haylapalooza will have their names on the back of the T-shirt. The sponsors include Streetside Records, KSDB-FM 91.9, KMKF-FM 101.5, Subway, Pizza Hut, Mr. Goodcents Subs & Pasta and Derby Complex.

Annual pinball tournament continues at Union arcade

ANDREW WIMMER
Kansas State Collegian

A pinball tournament has been going on at the K-State Student Union since March 30 and will continue until April 24. The high score will win a Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles pinball machine. So far, an estimated 50 students have participated in the event.

"It's a good deal," said Terri Eddy, manager of recreation at the Union. "The entry fee is just whatever it costs to play the game."

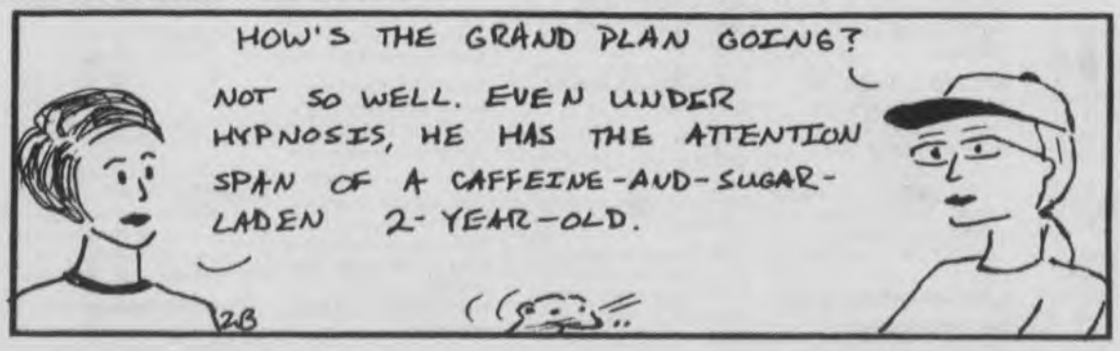
Eddy said the tournament is an annual event. Every year, the company that maintains the arcade games in the Union donates a machine to be given away. This year's machine is the Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles pinball machine.

At the end of the competition, the players with the four highest scores will face one another in a tournament to decide the winner.

"We are flexible about the time and date of the tournament," Eddy said. "We want to make sure students are not excluded by their schedules."

Eddy said the tournament has brought in more students to the Union's recreation area.

"The first week, we had 800 games played on the pinball machine," she said. "That is way more than usual."



Students can play during regular business hours.

High scores must be submitted to an attendant on duty.

"We are really laid back," Eddy said. "Having a good time is what this is all about."

Judge might ask agents to testify in Clinton case

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Setting the stage for a showdown with the Secret Service, Whitewater prosecutor Kenneth Starr has asked a judge to compel members of the White House security detail to answer questions about President Clinton's relationship with Monica Lewinsky.

An official knowledgeable about negotiations between Starr's office and the Justice Department said the prosecutor filed his motion Friday after the talks broke down. The Clinton administration plans to fight it, the official said.

Starr is seeking grand jury testimony from uniformed officers responsible for the security of the White House complex. He apparently believes they have information that might shed light on the Clinton-Lewinsky relationship, said the source, who spoke only on grounds of anonymity.

The Clinton administration argues that compelling testimony from tight-lipped Secret Service officials would undermine the trust between presidents and their protectors, a precedent it said could endanger future presidents.

The officers have no first-hand knowledge about the relationship, but may have been told something about it second-hand, the official said.

Starr's motion, initially reported by The Wall Street Journal, said no Secret Service officials are exempt from the requirement to testify.

He appears to be making a distinction between uniformed officers and plainclothed agents who are in the closest proximity to the president. The official said Starr's motion does not name plainclothed agents, although it does seek testimony from specific uniformed officers.

By not going after agents, Starr weakens the Secret Service's argument for a privilege against grand jury testimony, the official said.

The Justice Department had indicated earlier that compelling the testimony of anyone from the Secret Service — even uniformed officers — would set a dangerous precedent.

Starr's office has questioned several uniformed officers in recent weeks about the days leading up to Lewinsky's exit from the White House when she was transferred to a new job at the Pentagon in spring 1996, said two lawyers familiar with the prosecutor's investigation.

The lawyers, speaking on condition of anonymity, said that while the officers answered the prosecutors' questions, Starr wants to delve into additional areas as well.

Asked in Little Rock, Ark., whether the Secret Service was no longer cooperating with his office, Starr said, "I would not want to characterize it that way. We have remained ... in constant touch with other agencies of government.

"We do our very best to seek to accommodate the interests of other agencies while at the same time living up to our obligation to gather all the facts and to be able to evaluate those facts and present them to the grand jury," Starr said.

Navy commits to recycle napalm

▶ NAVY STEADFAST AFTER COMPANY DROPS CONTRACT.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Navy said it remains committed to destroying or recycling 3.3-million gallons of napalm, although a company that agreed to do the job pulled out of its contract as the first shipment traveled by rail across the country Tuesday.

The Pentagon seemed taken aback by the last-minute cancellation of the deal as two 6,000-gallon drums of the Vietnam-era jellied gasoline rode a railcar from California toward its Indiana destination, crossing New Mexico on Tuesday.

"Good question," Defense Department spokesman Ken Bacon said to reporters when asked what the military would do now that its napalm destruction plans are stalled.

Hoping to ease any public safety concerns, Bacon said there is no danger in shipping the incendiary product, which had been stored for two dozen years at a facility north of San Diego, because it is more stable and less volatile than gasoline.

"It's not explosive. It's very safe to transport," Bacon said.

> "WE'RE COMMITTED TO THIS PROJECT BECAUSE IT IS A SAFE AND RESPONSIBLE PROJECT."
> JON SMITH
> Navy Lieutenant Commander

Navy officials said they likely would seek another method of destroying the napalm or find another company to do the original job that was subcontracted out by a larger firm.

"We're committed to this project because it is a safe and responsible project," Navy Lt. Cmdr. Jon Smith said. "We are examining all of our options."

The military hasn't decided yet what to do about the current shipment, which was being transported by the Burlington Northern/Santa Fe Railway, Smith said.

The one-railcar load on a train of 60 to 80 cars will cross into Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas and Missouri before arriving in Illinois this weekend, the company said. From there, a smaller railroad was to transport the shipment from Illinois to Indiana.

Pollution Control Industries in East Chicago, Ind., had agreed in a $24-million contract to turn the 3.3-million gallons of napalm from the Fallbrook Naval Weapons Facility north of San Diego into fuel for cement kilns over two years.

But Monday, the company said it wanted out of the deal because some members of Congress outside of California complained about the project.

In a letter to the Navy and Battelle Memorial Institute, the project's primary contractor, PCI attorney Steven Jay Katz said, "PCI hereby advises Battelle to cease making any further shipments and to recall all shipments already made."

Battelle was sticking with the project, according to the Navy.

Rep. Ron Packard, R-Calif., said he wanted the napalm removed because state officials said it was leaking from aluminum canisters stored in an open field and contaminating soil in Fallbrook, an avocado- and citrus-farming community.

Indiana and Illinois lawmakers opposed accepting the waste for recycling.

"I will do everything in my power to see that PCI is allowed to withdraw from the contract and that no napalm enters northwest Indiana," Rep. Peter Visclosky, D-Ind, said.

Rep. Jerry Weller, R-Ill., accused the Navy of ignoring concerns of the Environmental Protection Agency, although the Pentagon said the project had EPA approval.

Researchers hope for faster Internet

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Three high-tech communications companies will offer an ultra-fast data pipeline and some of the needed network equipment as part of a $500 million contribution toward developing the next generation of the Internet.

"We will end the days when the World Wide Web is known by some as the world wide wait," said Vice President Al Gore, who announced the contributions Tuesday at the White House.

The revolutionary network — so fast it will transmit the contents of the 30-volume Encyclopedia Brittanica in one second — will make possible new ways of using computers, from long-distance learning to allowing a specialist in another city to look at real-time images of a beating heart and make a diagnosis.

It would take about 27 hours to transmit the 30 volumes of encyclopedias with a conventional 28.8-kilobit modem.

"That's a startling advance, and it will make a huge difference," Gore said. "Change sometimes comes not slowly and gradually, but when we cross thresholds, beyond which the reality is just completely different."

The announcement coincides with the spring meeting of the project's organizers, the University Corporation for Advanced Internet Development, which begins today in Washington.

Gore also announced a $50 million investment in Internet-related projects by the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, the central research and development organization for the Defense Department. The existing Internet — originally called ARPANET — grew from investments by the agency during the 1960s.

For the project, Qwest Communications International offered use of its high-speed fiber-optic network, which runs from Los Angeles to New York. The administration put the market value of Qwest's offer at $500 million over three years. The other two companies, Cisco Systems and Northern Telecom, are offering network equipment, such as routers and switches.

Qwest said its contribution amounted to 1/364th of its network capacity on its new transcontinental line.

"The asset is sitting there, so we can make some good use of it," said Joseph Naccio, the chief executive officer for Qwest.

"We can be on the cutting edge of research by universities, and it gives us a relationship with the universities to sell other services. And we're a small company. Most people don't know us, and here comes Qwest out of nowhere — we beat out AT&T, MCI, WorldCom and Sprint. The brand value of that alone is going to be worth a lot of money."

Administration officials said the new Internet will focus on better reliability for network-critical projects, such as telemedicine.

The current Internet treats all chunks of data — whether it's an innocuous e-mail message or an image of an infant's failing heart — as the same priority as they travel over the worldwide network.

The new Internet also will be faster. In its earliest stages, organizers hope to connect at least 100 universities about 100 times faster than current connections allow and a smaller group of schools at speeds 1,000 times faster.

Politicians ask Clinton to minimize intervention

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BELFAST, Northern Ireland — Protestant politicians appealed Tuesday for President Clinton not to campaign in Northern Ireland for voter approval of a historic peace agreement.

A negotiator for the biggest pro-British Protestant party, badly split over its support for the accord, said any Clinton intervention before the essential May 22 referendum might be "misunderstood" by Protestants resentful of foreign pressure to compromise.

"The people of Northern Ireland will want to make up their own minds, on a very important question, without people from outside the United Kingdom becoming involved," said Reg Empey of the Ulster Unionist Party, one of the eight parties that approved of Friday's accord.

Another significant Protestant party — hostile to the agreement and U.S. involvement in brokering it — said any American efforts to encourage "yes" votes would strengthen their own "no" campaign.

"Unionists have seen the bias, the way that the American administration has constantly elevated IRA-Sinn Fein to a stature they don't deserve," said Nigel Dodds, a lead negotiator for Ian Paisley's Democratic Unionists until the party withdrew from the talks last year in protest of Sinn Fein's involvement.

Clinton said Monday he hadn't decided whether to visit Northern Ireland next month when he's in England for a G-7 economic summit, stressing that he'd need to be invited by both sides in the dispute.

The Irish government and the north's rival wings of Catholic opinion, Sinn Fein and the moderate Social Democratic and Labor Party, all want him to come.

The Irish government, meanwhile, freed nine IRA prisoners from its top-security Portlaoise prison today in hopes of promoting the outlawed group's support for the Northern Ireland peace accord.

The nine inmates — five from Londonderry in the British-ruled north, four from the Irish Republic — had been serving sentences for a range of arms and explosives offenses.

Eight had been due to be freed within the next 18 months, but one wasn't due for release until 2005.

The Irish Republican Army has observed a cease-fire since July 1997 in its campaign to break Northern Ireland's ties to Britain and abolish the Protestant-majority state.

The Irish government frequently has granted early paroles to IRA inmates, most recently in December, to encourage that truce.

Fewer than 40 IRA members remain in custody in the Irish Republic, compared with more than 400 in Northern Ireland.

The Irish government had been keen to demonstrate concrete benefits of compromise and was expected to free some prisoners before Sinn Fein's two-day conference starts Saturday.

The agreement, brokered after 22 months by the talks chairman, former U.S. Sen. George Mitchell, would create a new Northern Ireland Assembly that Protestants and Catholics operate together — and cooperate formally with the Irish Republic.

The deal keeps Northern Ireland firmly linked to Britain and its troops based here for the foreseeable future. But conservative Protestants view with disbelief other British government commitments in the document to free all IRA prisoners within two years, to dismantle British army fortifications as security conditions warrant, and to allow Sinn Fein to enter the new Assembly without IRA disarmament.

While the British and Irish governments aren't fearful of a majority "no" vote, they do worry that a large minority "no" would deny the deal the overwhelming public endorsement that they feel it will require.

Meanwhile, in a secret Dublin venue, Sinn Fein party leaders wrestled with their own difficulties in advance of trying to sell the agreement to grassroots members this weekend.

Sinn Fein chairman Mitchel McLaughlin said he expects the party's rank and file to "recognize the gains that have been made and the opportunities that have been created."

Sinn Fein officials already were predicting that the weekend's conference would produce no definitive vote on whether the party unambiguously accepts the agreement.

A particular problem for IRA supporters is the Irish government's promise to end its constitutional claim to Northern Ireland.

Voters in the Irish Republic will be asked to approve an amendment as part of its own "yes" or "no" referendum on the accord May 22.

The new constitutional wording defines the Irish nation in terms of its people — including Irish-Americans — rather than in terms of the entire island's territory.

Plan to prioritize seating by financial contribution

ANDREW WIMMER
Kansas State Collegian

A plan by the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics to change the way football seats are assigned to public season-ticket holders has received mixed reviews from football fans.

Seating assignment at home football games is being reviewed by the athletic department. Athletics Director Max Urick said "Plan 2000," which has yet to be finalized, will allocate seats to long-time fans and big-money contributors.

"We are looking for an equitable way to allocate seat assignments," he said. "All factors will be considered."

Season-ticket holders were informed of the planned change when they received this year's ticket-renewal forms.

"Beginning with the year 2000, football season seat location at KSU Stadium will be determined by level of support to the Ahearn Scholarship Fund," according to the form. "A complete description of 'Plan 2000' will follow, which outlines future seating opportunities."

Urick said other Big 12 Conference schools follow similar principles for their seat assignments.

"Other schools have programs like this one," he said. "It's common knowledge that they reward those who contribute more. It's just not out in the open."

Now, longtime season-ticket holders have the opportunity to move to better seats, based on seniority, when they become available. Urick said the new system would figure both contributions and longevity into seat placement.

Bob Cavello, business manager for the athletic department, said no fans will be excluded from the stadium, though their seats might change.

"People may have to move, but they will still be in the stadium," he said.

Cavello said the athletic department does not have a clear policy on seating, and Plan 2000 will solve that.

"Right now, we have people who are sitting on the five-yard line who are giving $5,000, and people who are sitting on the 40-yard line are not giving anything," he said. "We have had people who want to move up and are willing to contribute, but since we have no policy toward contributors, then we can't do that."

Urick said he isn't worried that fans might have to decide between donating to the scholarship fund to keep their seats or traveling to a bowl game.

"Fans who can afford to travel to bowl games generally can afford to contribute," he said. "That is not one of my concerns."

Cavello agreed and said families who plan for the bowl game also will be able to meet the financial burden of contributing to the fund.

Urick also said recent K-State graduates will find it difficult to receive preferred seating if they want to continue to support the team.

"They will be at a disadvantage because they will be the low man on the totem pole, being new season-ticket holders, and not being able to contribute financially," he said.

Feedback from fans has been what Urick expected.

"Some people have called and said it's about time we do something like this and that we need to stay in competition with other schools," Urick said. "We have also received negative feedback, which is understandable."

Mike Jones, former K-State student and five-year football season-ticket holder, said longevity and contributions should be weighed equally in order for the program to work.

"I don't have a problem with them doing that, because other schools do it," Jones said. "As long as it is done fairly, I can see where it would be beneficial for both parties."

William Warner, K-State graduate and Manhattan resident, said the new

Ireland stresses strength, persistence to improve state of women's equality

KELLY REDDING
Kansas State Collegian

"If you think that one person can't make a difference, think again."

That was the point made by Patricia Ireland, president of the National Organization for Women, in the lecture she delivered Wednesday night in McCain Auditorium.

Through personal examples and stories, Ireland's lecture centered around the struggles of women's equality and what steps need to be taken to improve the situation and ensure a strong future.

"I want to celebrate how far women have come in the last 30 years," she said. "It really has been extraordinary progress in women's equality. But I also want to sound a warning bell, because it's very clear that all that we have won is at risk and could get pushed back."

Ireland said there is still room for improvement in the way women are treated in the work force.

"We are still making 74 cents to every dollar that men earn," she said. "Someone is still pocketing that other 26 cents."

Ireland also warned against harassment toward women in the workplace. She said that sexual harassment works to force women out of the work force, especially when they are employed in non-traditional careers.

"Right now, companies are trying very hard to stay out of court," she said. "They are actually making women sign away their rights to go to court in the case of harassment, and that includes race, sex and age."

Ireland encouraged people to come together and create power in numbers.

"We need to globalize and create non-negotiable demands against harassment in the workplace," she said.

Ireland also talked about the need for more work about lesbian and gay issues in society.

"If any woman steps out of line and speaks their thoughts, they will be deemed a lesbian," she said. "This is one reason why we need to keep working for lesbian, gay and transsexual issues. First of all, it's right on principle, but second, it's a very pragmatic political issue and every time one of us steps forward and speaks up for women's issues and gets charged with being a lesbian, it will keep a lot of women from being willing to be part of our movement."

Encouraging people to join in the movement, Ireland said there is a place for everyone.

"You need to know that there is something that you can do to help," she said. "You can help make changes from inside the institutions. You can speak up and tell the truth about your lives. You can speak up in a class when you feel that something is unfair."

Ireland also stressed the importance of being involved in political issues.

"Please become a registered voter, and keep your right to vote," she said. "Women do vote differently from men, and we need that today."

She also encouraged people to run for offices where they can help influence and change policy.

"We need women and men to run for office who believe in equal rights. You don't have to be qualified," she said. "We need more teachers, more nurses, and more social workers to speak out."

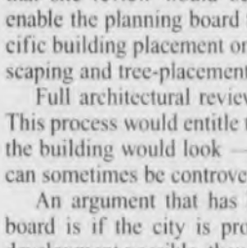
Board mixed on aesthetics, site regulation

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Editor's Note: This is the third and final installment in a series of stories focusing on Manhattan's development.

Nearly two months after a fire leveled two buildings in Aggieville, the hole it left is still vacant.

No one knows what will be built.



And no city authority can regulate how a new project would look or even if it would fit into the context of the pedestrian-oriented Aggieville district.

What do we think? The Collegian editorial board voices support for strengthening the city planning board. See Page 4.

The Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board, acting as the governing body that advises the City Commission on new development, has no power to consider the architectural issues and only limited power to consider site issues that could mean the difference between a well-developed project and a poor one.

That fact has bothered some of the board members, who think more review would translate into a better-developed city. But other board members and commissioners have expressed caution that too much regulation could scare off developers and their investment money.

Planning for Growth

More regulation vs. more growth

Most of Manhattan's planning community agrees that site review would be a good idea. This would enable the planning board to ask developers for a specific building placement on the site and for some landscaping and tree-placement jurisdiction.

Full architectural review has only limited support. This process would entitle the board to sign off on how the building would look — an aesthetic judgment that can sometimes be controversial.

An argument that has been used on the planning board is if the city is providing a street that makes development possible, then the board should have a say in how the building would look architecturally and on the site.

"I'm not sure if, when we get the big projects, we would be able to hold our ground," said Ray Weisenburger, a member of the planning board for 18 years and associate dean of the College of Architecture, Planning and Design.

Weisenburger said he thought smaller projects would be easier to regulate because small-business owners wouldn't have as much bargaining power as a hotel or big store might.

Controversies and denied projects have come before the planning board in the past. The plan by developer Cohen-Esrey to build apartments was denied because of worries about flooding. However, denying a project based on its architectural merit is a different story.

"It's just real difficult to accomplish," said Bruce Snead, Manhattan mayor and former member of the planning board. "I'm open to that proposal, but it's tough. Getting to agreement as to what is acceptable or meets minimum standards can take a lot of work.

"Is this community ready to commit to that?"

The board is working on a set of site-planning guidelines that could be incorporated into the subdivision regulations for Manhattan. However, this would not encompass development that occurred in existing zoned property.

"I would prefer it if we could come up with some general criteria and guidelines so the developer would have some idea of quality site-planning issues," said

Jones' appeal pending on financial costs, sufficient evidence of personal damages

DALLAS — As Paula Jones contemplated the future of her sexual harassment suit against President Clinton, one of her legal advisers and top financial backers said Wednesday "the case is alive and vibrant."

Jones and her lawyers, in a series of meetings Wednesday, were discussing the odds of winning an appeal of the April 1 decision by Judge Susan Webber Wright in Little Rock, Ark., which found the suit did not merit a trial. Factoring into the talks were concerns about how much of a toll continuing the fight would take on Jones, both emotionally and financially, her adviser said.

While Jones' camp has suggested in recent days that an appeal was "90-percent sure," her spokeswoman sounded less definite.

Jones plans to announce her decision today at an afternoon news conference.

"We have a lot of things to look at. What's the human toll? What's the financial toll?" said Susan Carpenter McMillan, Jones' adviser and spokeswoman.

Attorney John Whitehead, head of the Charlottesville, Va.-based Rutherford Institute, the conservative foundation that has been paying expenses in Jones' civil suit, said he came to Dallas prepared to finance an appeal.

"There are some really optimistic signs. You can't guarantee a win on appeal, but we are saying it could be a partial reversal," Whitehead said in a brief telephone interview.

"Do I think the case is alive and vibrant? Yes, it's alive and vibrant. It's going to hang in there, and the White House is probably going to be sorry."

Whitehead said he felt confident that Jones' other attorneys — in the law firm of Rader, Campbell, Fisher & Pyke — also were recommending that she appeal.

"Everybody's poised. The legal team is poised," he said.

Jones and her husband, Stephen, ducked into and out of the law offices without comment to reporters.

Jones, 31, has waged a drawn-out fight against Clinton since she filed a civil suit claiming he asked her to perform a sex act in an Arkansas hotel room when he was governor and she was a state employee.

Clinton has said he does not recall such a meeting and has denied doing anything improper.

In dismissing Jones' suit, Wright said there wasn't sufficient merit to her allegations to take the case to trial.

Wright noted that Jones continued to work at the Arkansas Industrial Development Commission for an additional 19 months and never filed a formal complaint or told her supervisors of the incident.

Clinton's lawyers had said that even if he had exposed himself and asked Jones for sex on May 8, 1991, the case against him was "veneer-thin" because there was no proof that she suffered in her state job, as she alleged.

Pol Pot dead from Wednesday heart failure, Thai military, Khmer Rouge sources say

BANGKOK, Thailand — Pol Pot, leader of Cambodia's radical Khmer Rouge movement that was responsible for the deaths of up to two million people, has died, Thai military and rebel sources said today.

There was no official announcement of Pol Pot's death from either the Thai or Cambodian governments. But a Khmer Rouge guerrilla, who identified himself as an assistant to Gen. Khem Nuon, said the 73-year-old Pol Pot died of heart failure late Wednesday night.

"It's true that he died," said the aide, who did not identify himself.

"I was there, I saw it with my eyes."

The Khmer Rouge guerrilla was contacted by telephone near the Thai-Cambodian border, where a hard-line faction is holding out against Cambodian government forces. Khem Nuon is one of the group's senior commanders.

A Thai military officer, contacted by telephone near the Thai-Cambodian border, said Pol Pot died in his sleep late Wednesday near the former Khmer Rouge stronghold of Anlong Veng in northern Cambodia. The officer spoke on condition of anonymity.

There had been a number of reports of the ailing leader's death in recent years.

Pol Pot and his Khmer Rouge captured the toppled U.S.-backed Cambodian government in 1975 and began a massive purge of Western influences.

Up to two million Cambodians died through mass execution, disease and starvation during the mid-1970s. One person in five died of starvation, overwork, illness or execution.

A 1979 Vietnamese invasion ousted the Khmer Rouge, who retreated to the jungles to fight successive governments.

There have been calls for Pol Pot to be brought before the International Court of Justice in the Hague to stand trial for war crimes and crimes against humanity.

In a bloody internal struggle last year, Pol Pot was overthrown by his former comrades and was forced to face a communist-style "People's Tribunal." He was then put under house arrest.

Since then, the Cambodian government has pushed the rebels out of their stronghold of Anlong Veng into jungles near the Thai border, and has negotiated the defections of many Khmer Rouge rebels.

Pol Pot has never shown regret, or even recognition of the misery he caused.

His "conscience is clear" he told a Western journalist in October 1997.

While he acknowledged "mistakes," he suggested he had been the target of a plot to discredit him, perhaps by Cambodia's traditional enemy, Vietnam.

Steakhouse to open in fall

▶ PECOS RED'S PLANS TO BUILD RESTAURANT IN EAST MANHATTAN.

LINDSEY FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

At the door, a galvanized bucket full of peanuts welcomes hungry patrons to crack the shells and throw them on the wooden floor.

Pecos Red's Steakhouse, a new restaurant coming to Manhattan, does not require etiquette.

The restaurant will be built on Sarber Lane between Sirloin Stockade and Dillons. The target date for finishing construction was Aug. 1, but it has been delayed for a construction permit until later this fall.

Pecos Red's is owned by the same company that owns the Sirloin Stockade chain. Sirloin Stockade will divide its management staff to work at Pecos Red's. Both restaurants will hire more staff, but Pecos Red's will hire 60 to 80 new employees.

Stockade General Manager Tim Tretcher said design changes have delayed construction of the new restaurant.

"The blueprints have been redone several times because we are waiting for the Texas franchise to report what changes need to be done," he said.

Tretcher said the company is waiting to go through the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board to discuss any variations of the restaurant's zoning with the City Commission to ensure a successful construction.

> "MANHATTAN'S RESTAURANTS ARE GOOD, BUT EVERYONE HAS BEEN TO ALL OF THEM A MILLION TIMES."
> STEPHANIE WILLYARD
> sophomore in speech pathology

The restaurants are located throughout the Midwest, including Oklahoma and Texas.

Michael Mazouch, junior in agricultural technology and management, said a steak franchise should do well.

"Manhattan is a very agriculture-related town with a lot of beef eaters," he said. "People like to go out and eat steak."

He said other steak restaurants in town have long waits for tables on busy nights.

"I think this restaurant might divert business and hopefully satisfy more people," Mazouch said.

The restaurant will have a 200 to 240 seating capacity. There will also be a full bar setting with pub tables.

"We're maybe not going to target a different clientele, but give our clientele, as well as people that don't really eat with Sirloin Stockade, another place to eat in Manhattan," Tretcher said.

Stephanie Willyard, sophomore in speech pathology, said she thinks Pecos Red's sounds like a fun place to take a date or go out with friends.

"This restaurant is a great idea for Manhattan," Willyard said. "Manhattan's restaurants are good, but everyone has been to all of them a million times."

Tretcher said Pecos Red's menu includes appetizers, fish and chicken, and specializes in ribs and steaks.

Sarah Saueressig, development research and information manager of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce, said both Stockade and Pecos Red's will continue to add character to Manhattan.

"We are pleased to have Pecos Red's Steakhouse as a community neighbor," she said.

Manhattan parks department searches for volunteer coaches for summer baseball, softball

NATE JENKINS
Kansas State Collegian

The Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department needs Little League coaches this summer, and Recreation Supervisor Mike Buchanan said it's a perfect chance for K-State students to get involved and enjoy the sunshine.

"We encourage students who are going to be here in the summer to sign up for it because it's a great opportunity," he said. "It's a fun job, and I think indicating on a résumé that you were a volunteer coach is a big help, too."

Half of the 120 Little League baseball and softball teams have coaches, leaving 60 coaching spots open for the season, which is slated to begin the first week of June and end around July 25. There is no deadline for interested coaches, but Buchanan said it's good to be lined up with a team before practices begin May 10. There is no formal application process, though Buchanan said he recommends that coaches have three qualities.

"Coaches obviously have to know about the sport, be committed not just to the time it takes but have a willingness to coach, and most importantly they have to like kids," he said.

The leagues are divided by one- or two-year age groups up to 12th grade, and interested coaches can pick what age they would like to coach because all of the leagues now have openings.

Time commitment is an issue for coaches who have other responsibilities, and Buchanan said people can expect to spend about four to six hours a week with youngsters, excluding the game time.

Pat Stewart, interim director of the animal resource facility on campus, coached third-grade girls' softball last year and said she enjoyed every minute. This year she'll coach fourth-grade softball.

"I had a wonderful time," Stewart said. "We didn't win many games, but it was really fun to watch them learn."

Stewart said it was satisfying to watch players develop while knowing that, unlike football or even soccer, they were learning a sport they could enjoy 30 or 40 years down the road.

"It's a lifetime sport, and I want to get them excited," Stewart said.

Haymaker Hall Residence Life Coordinator Todd Clark signed up to coach fourth-grade boys' baseball after having a positive experience coaching youth soccer.

"I've always wanted to coach Little League baseball, and this is a good chance to do it," he said.

Manhattan planning board needs more power

It's time to consider giving the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board some sharper teeth.

As Manhattan expands and new development is realized in older parts of the community, there exists the potential to alter the feel of the city's neighborhoods. While some neighborhoods could use a renovation, others are special places that need looking after by the city's planners.

The planning board has only limited capabilities in the review of site and architectural plans. And the planning board doesn't necessarily need to control the architecture of a residential subdivision because this usually can be done by an active homeowner's association.

In commercial districts, such as downtown, if developers meet the basic zoning ordinances of their sites, that's considered enough. However, this is a minimum. Why not let the planning board control how the building is sited? Why not let the board have limited control over the architectural feel — materials, massing and heights — of a new development?

K-State is a good example the city would do well to follow. Limestone construction is a hallmark on campus, mainly because building programs require architects to use the material.

But what if there were no regulations? What if an architect could build a brick building in the middle of campus? That would significantly affect the success of the campus as a place.

The same goes for Manhattan.

As both permanent and transient residents of Manhattan, we've seen the direction most recent growth has taken. Unpleasant metal farm buildings posing as mini-malls could never dream of replacing the solid brick or stone buildings of downtown. So why do we build them?

We do not advocate an elitist architectural review board that would wield its power to champion one architectural style over another. But there are simple concepts of building that are necessary considerations for any community that genuinely cares about its appearance.

If the planning board were to have full review of site plans and an agreed-upon limited architectural review, Manhattan could keep its small-town Kansas feel a few decades longer.

Anti-tobacco lobby resorts to

with rhetoric to limit personal freedom

I began to suspect a problem when in 1996, Texas' attorney general announced, apparently in all seriousness, that "history will record the modern-day tobacco industry alongside the worst of civilization's evil empires."

Again, I questioned my own morality as I puffed away and watched an earnest young man on television proclaim that breathing other people's smoke is morally equivalent to being sprayed with machine-gun fire.

I stood by in the name of moral cleansing as I was banned from restaurants, airports and malls. I fought quietly and watched as "my own kind" were persecuted and abused for the habit they had chosen.

The time has come, however, to evaluate the anti-tobacco push in the United States. If these health-conscious do-gooders want to ban something, an acknowledged risky habit that really only affects the individual, then let's ban motorcycle riding, too. If risky behavior is the target, then alcohol, snow-skiing, hunting and bar darts all have to go.

Most people in America would agree smoking is a personal health problem. Smoking undoubtedly warrants some modest public measures, most of which already have been taken: moderate tobacco taxes, public education and prevention of unreasonable nuisance to nonsmokers.

VIEWPOINT

SCOTT HOPPER

Scott is a junior in psychology. You can send e-mail to Scott at hoppa@ksu.edu.

Like overeating, smoking is a private health problem.

Lately, the anti-tobacco crusade has become a campaign against liberal principles. We will tell you what is good for you. You don't get to decide for yourself. In that case, tax fatty foods. There are about as many obese Americans as there are smokers, but restaurants don't make them go outside to enjoy a cupcake.

The common rhetoric used by anti-smokers to try to pull the private health problem into the public arena is the danger of passive smoke. These dangers are exaggerated. Two years ago, America's Congressional Research Service noted that only seven of the 34 studies then available found statistically significant health effects from passive smoking. The effects were so small it was hard to pin down with any certainty at all. Basically, you won't get cancer from going to a bar once a week.

To really study the effects of passive smoke, one has to observe those who live with smokers day in and day out. Albeit, extended exposure to passive smoke might pose a health hazard. So segregate smokers to a designated area and let them relish in their own cancer-causing fumes. End of discussion.

No one argues that smoking is bad for you, but those who believe the random waft of cigarette smoke will significantly push them to an early grave are fooling themselves. Actually, that hamburger for lunch will get you there faster. Those who expose their children on a daily household basis to cigarette smoke are bad parents. No amount of taxation or regulation will change that.

Another common argument is smokers cost society money. Smokers use publicly funded medical care, take leave for illness, et cetera. Actually, smokers die before they can collect pension benefits. Cigarettes are heavily taxed, and smokers end up paying well more than their costs to society. Kip Viscusi, a Harvard University economist, conducted several economic analyses on this subject and concluded, "they all show that smokers save society money."

There are many risky things in life, and the public is well aware of the health problems associated with smoking.

This, however, is an individual risk. The random cigarette fume in an airport lounge will do no more damage to a person than opening the microwave before the food is done.

If California and America want to crusade against smoking, so be it. If it's to protect the public from health hazards, then more ostracized items might follow. Eat your cupcakes now, because you might not be able to later.

This is not as much an attack on cigarettes, but an attack on our personal freedom to choose. A handful of nonsmokers tired of the stinky fumes are hiding behind a shield of morality. They care less about smokers' health than smokers do. I know it's bad, but I want a choice.

America likes to make laws, and here come a few more.

Columnist rethinks anti-tobacco position

Well, butter my butt and call me bread.

This weekend I finally realized I had misapplied my allegiances for too many years. I remember learning in first grade history class how tobacco was a New World agricultural product, how European men and women alike had quickly learned to smoke tobacco, seeding the glorious clouds of fumes one now walks through when entering the K-State Student Union from the north entrance (and the east entrance during break time).

Despite tobacco's storied position in colonial history, I bought into the anti-tobacco rhetoric thrown my way, understanding the Surgeon General's warnings as proof that smoking was indeed harmful to one's health.

I heralded the recent push for anti-tobacco legislation as a wonderful turn of events, an idea whose time had come, a train that had finally reached the station, a glowing butt that would finally get snuffed out. Who could resist the euphoria? Congress certainly couldn't. Even though Big Tobacco infused nearly $4.2 million into the 1995-96 election cycle, last June's compromise that would have demanded large sums of cash from the tobacco industry in exchange for legal caps on liability and excise tax hikes didn't seem to be the product of law-makers under the influence of tobacco cash.

VIEWPOINT

PAUL ROBBEN

Paul is a senior in chemistry and biochemistry. You can send e-mail to Paul at vladi@ksu.edu

> THE TOBACCO INDUSTRY LAWYERS ACTUALLY MAINTAINED THAT A PORTION OF THE INDUSTRY'S JUSTIFICATION FOR ITS SUDDEN REJECTION OF THE CONGRESSIONAL AGREEMENT WAS THAT THE INDUSTRY COULD NOT BEAR TO THINK THAT THE $1.50 PER PACK TAX INCREASE (TO BE SPACED OVER TEN YEARS), WOULD UNFAIRLY BURDEN THE POOR.

So what went wrong, when members of the tobacco industry began vowing to back out of the agreement?

I knew the agreement was harsh, and that it certainly would cut into the profit margins of Big Tobacco. The agreement wouldn't exist, however, if the protection from uncapped liability claims and per-pack excise tax hikes didn't represent a better overall business opportunity for members of the industry. So why back out now? Wanting an answer, I spent some time channel surfing Sunday morning, hoping I would receive an answer from Sam Donaldson or maybe even Kenneth Copeland. Satisfaction was not long in coming. Tobacco industry lawyers seemed to be everywhere, bearing glad tidings that forced me to rethink my position.

The tobacco industry lawyers told the tale of an industry whose products result in the tragic, painful death of 400,000 Americans each year. They told the tale of an industry that has lied to the public about the addictiveness of its products. They told the tale of an industry that has manipulated the manufacturing process it uses in an attempt to produce even more highly addictive products. They told the tale of an industry that has consistently targeted its advertising efforts at Americans below the legal age to consume its products, to help ensure that they have a constant stream of new consumers, replacing those who kick more than just the habit.

But the touching part of the industry's story, as conveyed by its lawyers, was reminiscent of an A.A. introductory statement. "Hello, my name is Big Tobacco, and I have failed to protect the poorest Americans."

The tobacco industry lawyers actually maintained that a portion of the industry's justification for its sudden rejection of the Congressional agreement was that the industry could not bear to think that the $1.50 per pack tax increase (to be spaced over 10 years), would unfairly burden the poor. Demographics of smokers long have shown that a disproportionate percentage of smokers hail from the "less than $25,000" per-year income bracket.

The tobacco industry feels it has wrung its hands long enough and has decided to fight back — defending the poor from their tax-hiking nemesis, the federal government. And to think I'd always thought of the tobacco industry in a negative light. They're the ones out crusading for the poor. It was at this point I realized I simply had been a pawn of a government campaign of hate and deception disseminated by public school teachers, authority figures and sufferers of emphysema. They were the enemy, not Big Tobacco. We should rise up in arms and demand accountability from our government.

Even better, why don't Kansas farmers raise tobacco? Environmental and climatic conditions be damned! We should do all we can to support the efforts of this benevolent industry. What has the wheat industry ever done to protect the poor? By flooding the marketplace with raw tobacco, we could help create a price-lowering glut that would lead to a surge in tobacco-industry profits, while still allowing the industry to lower the cost of its products, offering even further protection to Americans in the lowest income brackets.

Further, now that the tobacco industry has discovered its consciousness for the plight of the poorest citizens of the world, the tobacco industry certainly will be willing to curb its recruitment of teenage smokers. Who's poorer than teen-agers? And its market expansion in developing countries certainly will come to a screeching halt as well. If the industry is fighting for the rights of those Americans earning less than $25,000 per year, certainly they'll be willing to fight for the rights of those citizens of Asian and East European nations where the annual per capita gross national product is less than $2,500?

Simply put, I'm ecstatic I took the time to gain an understanding of the issues and no longer have to live with the doublespeak of the American government.

Insults detract from self-improvement

Warmer weather is bringing people out to exercise and walk on the streets and through campus. It also is bringing out boorish behavior.

To all of you who like to insult people who don't have the ideal appearance — and you know who you are — this is written to you.

I'm overweight. It is an undeniable fact, but I can admit it.

I run to lose weight. It comes off slowly, but I am working on my appearance.

At 9:15 a.m. Tuesday, near Anderson Hall, I was insulted about my weight. Then once again at 9:50 p.m. on Denison Avenue near the intersection at Claflin Road, someone shouted from a car that I should "keep running that weight off."

Say it to my face. Hiding behind surveying equipment or the interior of a car is the cowardly way to deliver an insult or criticism for that matter.

Furthermore, come up with new material. Not only were you picking on someone who is bettering herself, you are taking the easy way out. The fastest way to show your ignorance is to insult a physical feature. People who hide behind physical insults are precariously close to showing how truly stupid they are. Not only did you hurt my feelings, you didn't even have the courage to do it to my face.

VIEWPOINT

CATHY BACH

Cathy is a senior in journalism and mass communications.

Comments made to put someone down for things they can't immediately change, such as receding hairlines, genetic disposition to carry weight, a crooked nose, speech impediments, unwanted body hair and any other physical feature you consider less than ideal, are truly the coward's way out. They lead to low self-esteem, eating disorders and other psychological disorders.

I certainly hope people responsible for these types of actions don't realize what they are doing. If they do, it leads one to believe that they are not considerate of others.

Even if you have been insulted, it is not right to reciprocate by showering other people with insults. Two wrongs do not make it right.

Consider how you would feel if I took the physical feature you are most self-conscious about and talked about it to every person on campus. Consider how you'd feel if someone insulted your sister, parents, grandparents, significant other or your best friend about something they cannot immediately, or ever, change.

Would you ever make these comments in front of your parents? A prospective employer? Your boss? Your future in-laws?

I have the courage to acknowledge publicly that you humiliated me. I do not sit in the back of a car with my friends and hide behind the metal doors to insult people on the street. I do not stand behind a group of my buddies and insult strangers who are walking to class.

If you do not have the guts to be a grown-up and criticize me while looking me in the eye, have you truly become an adult? Or will you hide from confronting people and telling them what you truly think for the rest of your life?

It is not easy for people to admit their weaknesses and try to improve themselves. People beat themselves up enough without your help. If you lack a conversation starter when you're with your friends, why don't you try talking about your own imperfections?

Chances are good you'll have enough material to last the night. If you must insult a person's physical imperfections, do it to their face, so they will have the opportunity to comment on your imperfections.

Start owning up to your comments, instead of hiding behind that steel facade you call wit and the rest of us call a car.

Planning board discusses ability to regulate architectural review

Robert Stokes, a member of the board for seven years and an associate professor of civil engineering.

He said if a building meets the requirements of an existing zoned property, the planning board has no leverage to consider site planning.

Stokes said architectural review might go too far.

"It's hard to legislate and codify aesthetics," he said.

Gaining a consensus

Though there has been discussion about a more comprehensive review process, a consensus has not been reached.

"As a board, we're mixed on site review and architecture review," said Jerry Reynard, a three-year member of the planning board.

Reynard said he thinks an architectural review would benefit such areas as downtown and Aggieville, because the commercial appeal of the two areas relies on the small-town feel. He said a review could focus on building heights, setbacks and materials.

Some planners say the project for the open Aggieville lot, which has yet to be determined, is an important one to watch for infill development.

"I think it could demonstrate how an infill could be really sensitive to a district," said Brent Bowman, principal architect with Brent Bowman and Associates, and an active participant in city development.

"That project could be the next major architectural project for the community. I think it's important that the buildings look like they fit the place."

Tom Phillips, chair of the planning board and a private planning consultant, said close-knit, mixed development projects require more public review and scrutiny than is allowed to exist on the board now.

"Growth is a positive benefit of any community, but the type of growth has to be consistent with what the community wants," Phillips said. "It's not one of my goals to have growth for growth's sake."

policy will hurt the football team in the long run by placing a lower value on fan loyalty.

"As long as they're winning and the number of potential season-ticket holders is high, there will be people who are willing to make the donation," Warner said.

Warner, who has attended football games since 1956, was a member of the K-State Marching Band and worked as an usher at Memorial Stadium.

He said forcing fans to give money to the Ahearn fund in order to keep their seats won't help the university. He said donors will be forced to give less to other causes.

"The pie can only be divided up so far," Warner said.

Donations to the Ahearn fund from July 1996 to June 1997 were $1,214,331. This year's donations already total $1,423,712.

"We are slightly ahead this year," Urick said. "We will see how we do at the end of the fiscal year."

The Mike Ahearn Scholarship Fund goes toward student-athlete scholarships, which Urick said total about $2.3 million each year.

NOW president speaks about feminist issues

Before Ireland lectured, protesters stood near the entrances of McCain. Men, women and children were holding picket signs and singing hymns. The signs they held included phrases that denounced a variety of things from Ireland and NOW to homosexuality.

Brenda Lea Mayberry, president of the Manhattan and K-State chapter of NOW, said the protesters didn't prove to be a problem.

"We've had a terrific turnout," she said.

"It's kind of like reverse psychology. People will come out to see why there are picketers, and that brings us more publicity."

Michele Janette, assistant professor of English, said she was excited to hear Ireland's views on the future of feminism.

"It seems to me, and I am in hope of, feminism resurging," she said. "I'm thrilled to see how many students are interested in feminism. I think that her statements tonight will go across class and race, and I hope that they have some political teeth.

Jayhawks to barnstorm Kansas

LAWRENCE — University of Kansas seniors who won 123 basketball games and four conference titles in their four years as Jayhawks are getting ready for a nine-game "barnstorming tour" of Kansas.

Raef LaFrentz, C. B. McGrath and Billy Thomas will lead the team, which begins play Saturday with stops in Hays and Lindsborg, then plays Sunday at Salina.

Other games are planned at Topeka on Tuesday, Olathe North on April 24, Osage City on April 29, McPherson and Great Bend on May 2 and Shawnee Mission South on May 3.

Former Jayhawks Joel Branstrom and Scott Novosel also will play in all nine games, and Jerod Haase and Sean Pearson will be with the team for some.

Former Royals' pitcher to rove, instruct minor league pitchers

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A two-month retirement from baseball was all Mark Gubicza could stand.

Now he's ready to go back to work for Kansas City, the club he spent 12 years pitching for, as a roving minor league pitching instructor.

"It's tough being away from the game," said Gubicza, who still is listed as the Royals' all-time strikeout leader.

"I found I couldn't get it out of my system. I love being part of it. I couldn't see myself doing something else right now."

After pitching for the Royals from 1984-96, Gubicza signed with the Anaheim Angels, then retired in February.

But restless in his Northridge, Calif., home, he flew to Kansas City several weeks ago to speak with the general manager, Herk Robinson, and other Royals' officials.

"We actually started talking about some things during spring training," Gubicza said from California. "I just asked them if there was something I could do for the organization. I had told them every year I was there that when I was done playing, if they wanted me to come back, I'd be glad to.

"And now that I am through as a player, I want to help the Royals get back to the times when I first came up, back to a winning tradition."

The Royals are happy to welcome him back.

"Every contract we negotiated, he always said, 'Now, don't forget I want to come back and work for the Royals,'" Robinson said.

Gubicza's only request was that he have plenty of time at home with his wife, Lisa, and their three children.

"I told them that now that I'm retired, I don't think it would be fair to my family and my kids to be gone that much," he said. "I'm not going to be doing a ton of travel. When you're a player, the travel is part of the game. But when you retire, travel is a choice. My choice is to be around my family as much as I can."

It was only with great reluctance that Gubicza put his playing career behind him, he said. He had contemplated a comeback with the Los Angeles Dodgers this year.

"The ideal situation would be that I was still pitching, but that just wasn't in the cards," he said. "There weren't a lot of bullets left in my gun. I love the game, though, and if I can help Kansas City be better in the future, or in the present, then that's what I want."

When Gubicza was at his peak from 1984-93, the Royals were riding high. He was a key part of the 1985 World Series championship.

"In those days, if we had a crowd of 25,000, that was a bad night," he said. "Now 25,000 is a crowd to celebrate.

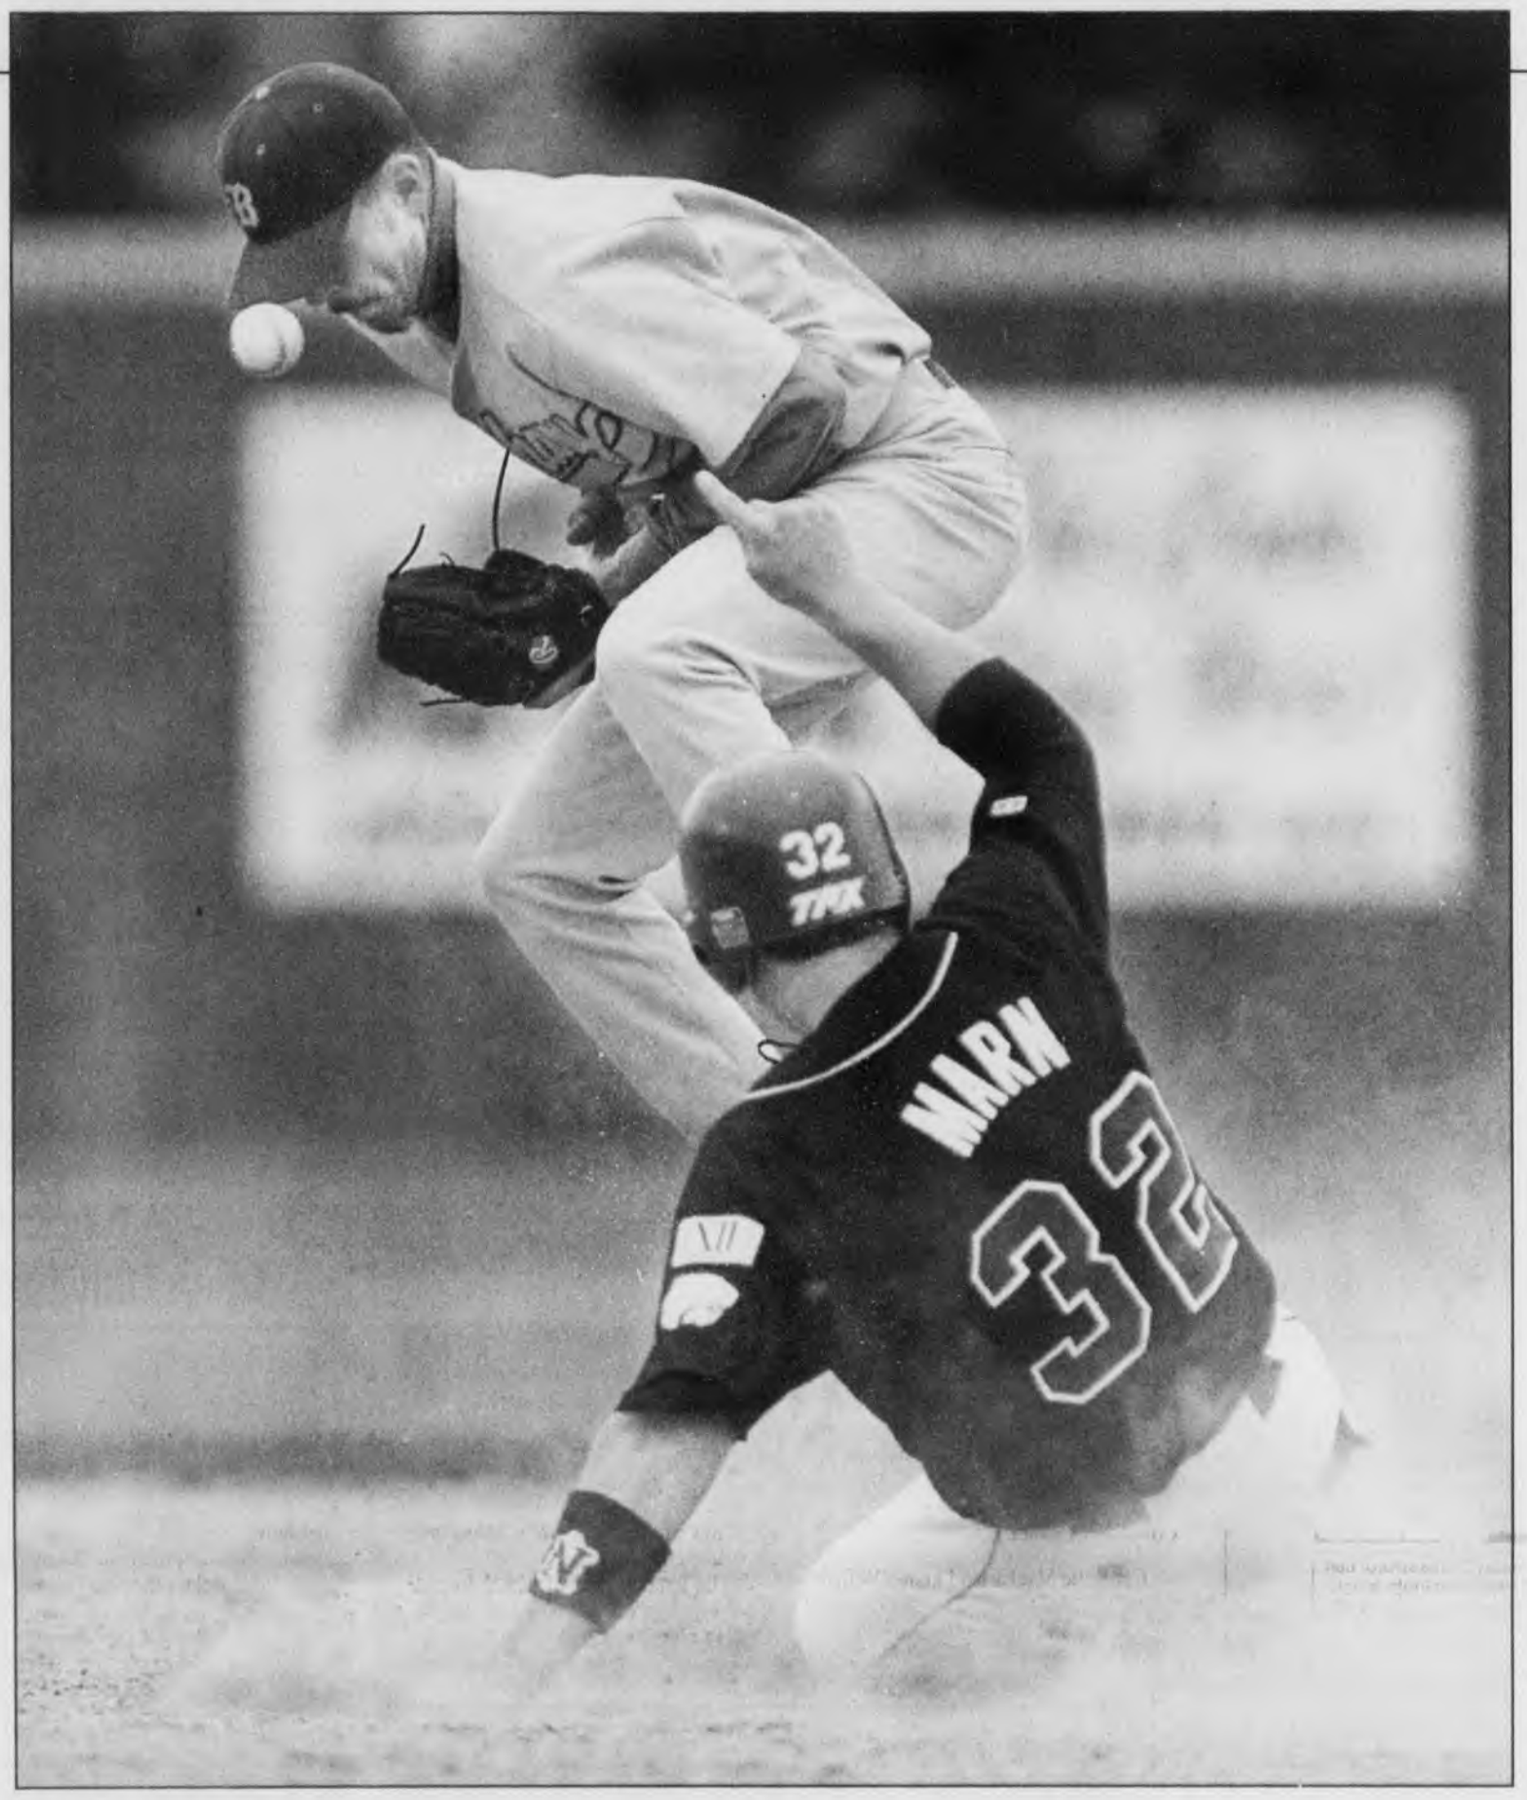
"I know they say that Kansas City has become a Chiefs town. But I remember going to Chiefs games with George Brett in the '80s, and you could sit just about anywhere you wanted.

"What I'm working toward is for Kansas City to be a Chiefs town in the fall and winter and a Royals town in the spring and summer. I think we can do it. I think we're already headed in the right direction."

Woods declaws Franklin Mint in lawsuit about golf souvenirs

Tiger Woods' lawsuit against the Franklin Mint over an unauthorized souvenir commemorating the 1997 Masters was settled with Woods receiving "a substantial monetary settlement" and a permanent injunction barring the company from using his name and likeness.

"Tiger Woods is reluctant to use litigation to stop his name and likeness from being pirated, but, in this case, that became his only option," Hughes Norton, Woods' agent for International Management Group, said on Wednesday.



Franklin Mint issued for sale at $37.50 a "Tiger Woods Eyewitness Commemorative Medal" last year marking his record-breaking victory in the Masters. Woods filed suit in U.S. District Court in the Central District of California.

Franklin Mint attorney Arthur Seidel argued that the company is a communications "medium" and the medal is the same as a newspaper, thus it is protected by the First Amendment.

U.S. District Judge Kim Wardlaw disagreed and issued a preliminary injunction last July against Stewart and Lynda Resnick of Beverly Hills; their company, Roll International; and its division, the Franklin Mint.

"I find the First Amendment in this case to be very weak," Wardlaw said. "The defendant's medal appears to be an attempt to capitalize on the plaintiff's fame. There is little if any protected speech. This is a commercial object."

Specific terms of the settlement are confidential.

Four times pitcher Chad Cosens was slated to start for the K-State baseball team. Four times games were canceled because of inclement weather.

Cosens finally got his chance Wednesday afternoon. He took the mound, threw seven innings and struck out a career-high nine batters, fueling the Cats to a 3-1 win over Bethany at Frank Myers Field.

"It was nice to finally get one," Cosens said. "It was frustrating because I was canceled, but it was nice."

It was Cosens' first win of the season and dropped his earned-run-average to 6.75.

"Best case scenario, I wanted him to go five innings, possibly six," pitching coach Mike Hensley said. "He extended that and exceeded our expectations."

Cosens had a no-hitter going through seven. He had a full-count on Bethany right-fielder Sean Spoontz when Spoontz took a fastball to deep right field for a homer.

"He hit a good pitch," Cosens said. "I was behind in the count and just threw it down the middle."

The game was scoreless through six, but K-State got on the board first in the bottom half of the sixth inning.

Josh Marn, who crossed the infield and played first base, led off with a walk and advanced to third on designated-hitter Quinn Cravens' single to left field. Third baseman Mark English hit a double to the gap in right-center field and scored Marn and Cravens.

K-State added an insurance run in the eighth inning. Marn singled to left field and advanced to second after right fielder Brian Bobier walked. Cravens reached on a fielder's choice where Marn was thrown out at third. Left fielder Kasey Weishaar hit a single to shallow left field and knocked in Bobier, pushing the score to 3-1.

"The young kids did a real nice job, I thought," K-State head coach Mike Clark said. "Offensively we played really well and with a lot more enthusiasm."

Clark shuffled the lineup a bit, inserting five freshmen. English, a freshman from Bishop Miege High School in Roeland Park, Kan., got the start at third base and went 2-4 with two RBIs. Clark said he was impressed with English's play.

"Mark English had a great ballgame and really opened our eyes," Clark said. "Not only did he do a good job defensively, but I can only think of one bad at-bat he had out of four."

Clark said he did not shuffle the lineup because of the outcome of Tuesday night's loss against Fort Hays State University.

"Those guys have earned an opportunity to play, and that's what we want to pursue," he said. "Those guys are here to learn, and if they don't get on the field it's hard for them to stay motivated in practice."

Also inserted into the lineup were four other freshmen, including shortstop Josh Cavender, left fielder Weishaar, second baseman Scott Voos and center fielder Michael Colosimo. The win ended a four-game losing streak for the Cats and increased their record to 14-20 for the year. Bethany dropped to 14-16.

K-State is back in action this weekend against Cal-State Northridge.

The Cats begin a 9/7 inning doubleheader at 4 p.m. Friday.

Jayhawks scoop standout Texas freshman out of team soap opera

Roy Williams has done it again.

He brought in another blue chip through the back door ala Lester Earl.

Former Texas freshman standout Luke Axtell recently made the best decision of his short basketball career — he transferred to the University of Kansas.

If y'all have been sleeping the past month, Axtell recently was the catalyst of a player revolt at Texas. The coup led to Texas' basketball coach Tom Penders offering his resignation. If you can read between the lines it means Penders was fired. Texas initially told him he was going to be reassigned, but instead of cleaning toilets or waxing the new Texas basketball coach and former Clemson coach Rick Barnes' car he opted to resign.

Smart move.

This entire mess began when Axtell was suspended from the team. Axtell then took fellow freshman standout Chris Mihm, the 7-foot behemoth, and a couple other Texas players to Texas athletics director DeLoss Dodds' house. But the players weren't there bearing house warming gifts.

Nope, Axtell and his fellow disgruntled teammates came knockin' on the door with a list of grievances. You see, losing tends to frustrate people. And trust me, if you played for a team with three future NBA players, maybe four, and you finished the season 14-17, you would have some grievances.

VIEWPOINT

JESS LOUK

Jess is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Jess at jess31@ksu.edu.

Somehow, after hearing of this meeting, the Texas basketball coaching staff decided it would be prudent to send a copy of Axtell's transcript to a local radio station. That, my friends, is a no-no. As can be expected, Penders claims to have had no knowledge of the decision.

In all fairness, Penders' assistant Eddie Oran, the man who sent the transcript, even backed him up. But let's point out that Penders did hire Oran, and his lack of integrity is a direct reflection on Penders.

Now Penders is on a sabbatical of sorts, Axtell is going to Jayhawk land and Texas hired Barnes.

Sounds like a soap opera, does it not? Well it's really this simple — everybody wins but Penders.

Axtell is going to become a dominant player. Under Roy Williams' tutelage, Axtell is going to receive a crash course in fundamental basketball. With the basketball knowledge Williams brings to the table, we are looking at the next Oscar Robinson. By the time Axtell is a senior he will be dropping more than 20 a game and dictating the flow of nearly every game he plays in.

Axtell has more pure basketball talent then 99 percent of the college players in the nation. He just has a natural knack for seeing things other players don't.

But Axtell has the fundamentals of a junior high player. He doesn't square his body half the time when he shoots, he boxes out like someone who has never rebounded in his life and his defense is suspect. These things can happen when you decide to play basketball in Texas.

But even with these defects, Axtell hit 39.3 percent of his three-point attempts last season, and he averaged 13.3 points a game and 4.3 rebounds. Not bad for a freshman playing on talent.

The Texas basketball players are getting a super coach in Barnes. Barnes had led Clemson to three straight NCAA Tournament bids. During his tenure there, he was 74-48. In fact, Barnes' first step at Texas was to introduce something Penders never understood — discipline. In his first meeting with his team he laid down the law — no earrings, no hats in buildings, no facial hair and no headphones on campus.

It's not just discipline that Barnes is bringing to Texas, "It's a team thing," as Kansas State running back Frank Murphy is fond of saying. If you watched Texas play this year you know the word "team" was a joke.

Barnes has told his players that if one of them is late to a team meeting or practice, the entire team runs. To top it all off, the team will have to eat a mandatory breakfast together every morning during the basketball season. Sounds like a team thing to me.

With Barnes coaching, Kris Clack, Mihm and Nnadubem Muoneke, Texas is going to win the Big 12 South. Too bad their old friend Axtell will be dropping some three-pointers on them the following year.

'THE TEMPEST' COMES TO NICHOLS

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

"THE TEMPEST" WILL BE PERFORMED TONIGHT THROUGH SATURDAY AND WEDNESDAY THROUGH APRIL 25 IN NICHOLS THEATRE. TICKET PRICES ARE $6 FOR STUDENTS AND SENIORS AND $9 FOR THE GENERAL PUBLIC.

Shakespeare's comedy opens tonight

CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

Charlotte MacFarland knows William Shakespeare.

MacFarland, associate professor of speech, communications, theater and dance, has directed "Romeo and Juliet," "Hamlet" and "Macbeth" at K-State in past years. She currently is directing Shakespeare's "The Tempest," scheduled to open tonight.

However, MacFarland said, "The Tempest" is very different from any other Shakespeare production she has directed. MacFarland set it in the Victorian era, to make the point that the ideas presented in the play can be applied to any time period.

"There seems to be a lot of revival of Shakespeare because these plays say so much about our times," MacFarland said.

Also, "The Tempest" was one of the last plays Shakespeare wrote before his death in April 1616.

"'The Tempest' was written at the end of Shakespeare's life," she said. "There's a voice of hope for the next generation in it. This play offers a more balanced view of life."

MacFarland said there are a couple ways in which the sets for the play might be made.

"There are two ways you can go with 'The Tempest,'" she said. "You can be simple with it, a black stage and a few boxes, or you can tell yourself this is a play about a mystical land and have a lot of visual effects."

After much discussion with the cast and crew, MacFarland said she decided to go with the latter of the choices, using elaborate costumes and lighting.

"We had discussions about how to create the mood. It was very collaborative," she said.

Vanessa Vaughn, junior in theater, plays the Spirit of Air in "The Tempest," and she said her role in the production has made her appreciate her surroundings more.

Show info
"The Tempest" shows tonight through Saturday and Wednesday through April 25.

"It's amazing how I notice the natural elements. It makes you think about how important they are," Vaughn said.

Evan Tuttle, sophomore in theater, plays the Spirit of Fire.

He also said the production has affected his life.

"It's an honor to be in this show," he said.

"It's such a big part of my life that I'll feel a void when it's over."

With the dazzling costumes and superior acting, MacFarland said, she hopes the production will inspire K-State students and Manhattan residents to learn more about what the K-State theater department has to offer.

"I'm always amazed how students don't take advantage of the fine arts. I'd love to have more students realize we're here, and that we have all of this available," MacFarland said. "I hope more people will commit themselves to discover what's available in the theater department."

"The Tempest" starts tonight and runs through Saturday, and again from Wednesday through April 25. All shows are at 8 p.m. in Nichols Theatre. Ticket prices are $6 for students and seniors, and $9 for the general public.

For more information, call the McCain Auditorium box office at 532-6428.

Movie offers twisted plot, music

JAKE PALENSKE
Kansas State Collegian

"Sliding Doors," a new film starring Gwyneth Paltrow, focuses on the turns a life can take with each seemingly irrelevant decision.

The movie will be shown by Union Program Council's Satellite Theatre committee on Tuesday in Forum Hall.

Review
Music

"Sliding Doors"
Original motion picture soundtrack.

4 stars
Keeps ya hummin'

The movie follows two parallel stories of the same character, Helen, as she makes her way through her life, with the stories merging in the ending. In the movie, there are actually two Helens. Each Helen makes different decisions than the other Helen throughout her life. The audience gets to see what a huge difference in Helen's life these small decisions make. At the end of the movie, the storylines merge.

The soundtrack is filled with as many twists and turns as the movie. With a diverse range of performers, including Elton John, Jamiroquai, Space Monkeys and Abra Moore, this album displays a balance of sounds many soundtracks lack.

The soundtrack is gratifying as a package, but there are a few standout tracks.

"Drug Soup" by Space Monkeys lends its blend of house/club music to the mix. This song has one of those really catchy riffs that will linger in your head for days. The lyrics also are cool, although hearing them requires close attention.

On the slower, romantic side, there is "Turn Back Time" by Aqua, of "Barbie Girl" fame. This song was a pleasant surprise, basically because it actually was good. After hearing Aqua's other offerings, one can't have very high expectations, but "Turn Back Time" is really a quality piece of music.

Basically, the insert of the compact disc tells the whole story of the music within. It contains the contrasting pictures of Helen as she appeared in both storylines of the movie, and the songs are divided up for each of her personalities.

The soundtrack reflects this split with its easily recognizable changes in musical style from the beginning to the end. It seems to fit the tone of the movie well, and the songs are all quite entertaining.

MTV to scout at Last Chance for participants of new show

TODD PACEY
Kansas State Collegian

If you have a sense of adventure and skill and would like to complete a two-week cross-country trek, MTV wants you.

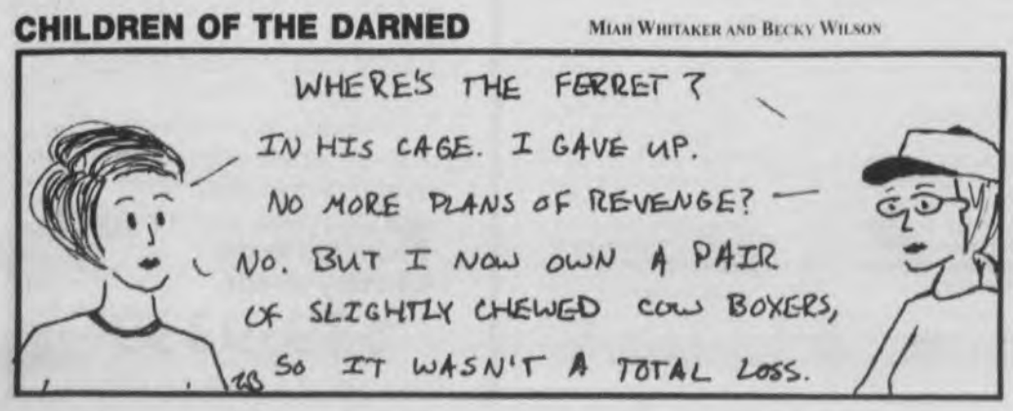
MTV personnel will be at Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon on Sunday to interview contestants for their new show, "Seven Up and Out." Between noon and 3 p.m., those interested will be given a chance to get their picture taken and to fill out an application.

Those who reach the next stage of the casting call will be brought back in after 3 p.m. for a more in-depth interview, Brendon Blincoe, casting director for "Seven Up and Out," said.

Blincoe said MTV is looking for seven energetic young people to travel across the United States. However, Blincoe said a sense of adventure is not all that is needed. Only skill will help the contestants make the entire journey, he said.

"It's kind of a 'Road Rules' rip-off, but it's more than that," Blincoe said.

"Road Rules" is a show on MTV in which five people travel across the continent in search of adventure. The participants in the show participate in different activities in order to win money so they can continue on their journey. While members on "Seven Up and Out" will be traveling across the country, there is one important difference.



"After each task, they kick the person who finished last out of the van and continue without them," Blincoe said.

The show will begin with seven competitors, but only one will survive the journey coast to coast. Their journey begins in Seaside, Calif., and ends at MTV's 1998 Summer Share in Seaside, N.J. The lone competitor will be given the reward of being a video jockey for one week at the beach house, Blincoe said.

Blincoe said some of the tasks the competitors must undergo to avoid elimination will be very diverse but are not completely finalized. One proposed event involves landing on an MTV logo after skydiving. Another proposed contest involves a comedic stand-up standoff.

President offers tornado victims words of sympathy, federal aid

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — Standing amid the rubble and ruin of central Alabama's deadliest tornadoes, President Clinton offered the victims words of encouragement and $3.2 million in new federal aid.

"We have to give people a way to look forward to tomorrow — a project, work to do, something that can be done to make a difference," Clinton said Wednesday after touring a flattened neighborhood in McDonald Chapel, a subdivision of Birmingham.

Clinton said the Labor Department would make available $3.2 million in emergency funds to Alabama to create temporary jobs for cleaning up the areas of Jefferson, St. Clair and Tuscaloosa counties hit by tornadoes last Wednesday.

His hands clasped behind his back and head bowed, the president slowly picked his way around heaps of twisted metal and piles of shattered boards that used to be people's homes. Severed tree trunks stood nearby, grotesque markers of a tornado that killed 33 people, most on the outskirts of Birmingham.

Clinton urged the community to look to the future.

"The process of restoration has begun because the most important thing you have — your spirit — was not destroyed," Clinton said.

Trying to lighten the mood, Clinton said with a chuckle that the owners of the debris-strewn property he was touring were "throwing an open house for us."

Clinton spent the morning at a victims relief center in nearby Pratt City, then visited McDonald Chapel before flying back to Washington, D.C.. He was making a quick stop at the White House before heading to Chile for a 34-nation Summit of the Americas.

In Pratt City, a predominantly black suburb of Birmingham, Clinton met with about 40 local residents who told of the tornado's wrath and their efforts to recover.

Standing next to the pile of timber and concrete blocks that had been home to a family of four, Clinton put his arm around the owner and said the tornado's impact was horrible.

"I'm glad so many people lived," he said. "The important thing is that we move assistance to them as quickly as we can. The obvious thing is to get focused on tomorrow, on coming back."

Neighbors held aloft a large-lettered sign reading, "Thanks, Mr. President, for coming to Pratt City."

The president signed it with his name and the words: "Thanks for hanging in there, God bless you."

In McDonald Chapel, Clinton announced that in addition to the $3.2 million in Labor Department emergency aid, the federal government would provide crisis counseling for victims.

He also said the National Council of Churches had pledged to help rebuild or repair all the churches hit by the tornado, which packed winds of up to 260 mph.

Alabama officials, including Gov. Fob James and Sen. Richard Shelby, R-Ala., praised Clinton for touring the storm-damaged area. Shelby noted that Vice President Al Gore had come last Friday, two days after the tornado hit.

"The people of Alabama appreciate you as president coming here because they know you are coming here because you care," Shelby said.

Clinton told Shelby and other officials he wanted the federal government to look into possibilities for organizing more centralized shelters in tornado-prone areas.

Retired Sen. Howell Heflin, D-Ala., told Clinton that nuclear bomb shelters built during the Cold War should be reopened to provide tornado protection.

March to commemorate those who died in Bataan

SHERYL WILLIAMS
Kansas State Collegian

Five Army ROTC cadets from K-State and an officer in the Kansas National Guard will participate in a 25-mile march Sunday to commemorate soldiers who fought and lost their lives in the Philippines during World War II.

The 10th Annual Bataan Memorial Death March, which is open to anyone, military or civilian, will travel across the hilly desert terrain of the White Sands Missile Range in New Mexico.

The march honors American soldiers who, in 1942, survived in the Philippine Islands on as little as one-quarter rations in conditions that included little to no medical assistance and virtually no essential equipment or air power. The soldiers, along with Filipino soldiers, eventually surrendered to Japanese forces.

Cadet Bob Beuerlein, senior in biology, said the Japanese could not conceive of soldiers ever surrendering.

"They kind of considered the soldiers that surrendered to be less than human," Beuerlein said.

"They forced the soldiers to march about 90 to 100 miles from the Bataan Peninsula, through the peninsula and then to a POW camp somewhere else on the island," he said.

"So the Bataan Death March was started as a tribute to the sacrifices they made."

Beuerlein is one of the five cadets who will participate in the march, which, he said, should take eight to nine hours to complete.

The honorary march is also a competition.

"As a team, we'll compete. We'll have to finish as a team," Beuerlein said. "Not everybody will finish. They'll get blisters on their feet, or the biggest problem they'll have down there will be the heat during the day."

Soldiers in the light division will wear their battle dress uniforms, and those in the heavy division also will carry backpacks weighing nearly 35 pounds.

Beuerlein, who will lead the Manhattan group, said he thought it would be a good idea to do something away from Manhattan because much of the time in ROTC is focused on campus, classes, leadership labs and training at Fort Riley.

"We basically wanted to implement some kind of adventure-type training into the military science program and try and get other students interested in Army ROTC, to let them know we do a lot more than just marching around campus," Beuerlein said.

The trip to New Mexico has been financed partially by various veterans' organizations.

Capt. Dan Wallace, assistant professor of military science, said the march will be an individual test for all of the participants.

"For the students here, obviously it'll be something they've never done before," Wallace said.

"Twenty-five miles is a long way to go.

"They're going to be out there with a lot of active army units, and some reserve units, and so it should be a good exercise and a good event for them," he said.

"Those guys are going to be smoked when they get done. They've trained hard, they've been working hard, and I think that they'll represent the program and the school very well when they get out there."

Donation to help train women pilots

"I DON'T THINK WE'LL BE ABLE TO TRAIN ENOUGH PILOTS, MALE OR FEMALE, SO THIS IS A HUGE ADVANTAGE FOR K-STATE-SALINA."

JON WEFALD
K-State president

SHERYL WILLIAMS
Kansas State Collegian

President Jon Wefald will accept a $1.18 million check at 11:30 a.m. today for K-State-Salina's College of Technology and Aviation from the Marian W. "Dolly" Hardman estate.

Dennis Kuhlman, dean of the technology and aviation college, and Gary Hellebust, CEO of the KSU Foundation, also will be present to receive the check in a ceremony at the Bennington State Bank in Salina, Kan.

Hardman, a K-State alumna and a pilot for more than 60 years, designated her gift to scholarships for students enrolled in flight training, preferably female students. She was a member of the Ninety-Nines Inc., an International Organization of Women Pilots.

Kuhlman said he was thrilled to have the support of Hardman but said he wished he could thank her for her generosity.

"The disadvantage of an estate gift like this is that I can't personally go to this woman and thank her for the opportunity she's providing for young women who choose to enter the field of aviation," Kuhlman said.

"This scholarship will form the base for a cadre of the future within aviation," he said. "The students that are supported on this scholarship will be the leaders of the 21st century, and she is providing one of the bases of support for those leaderships for the whole aviation industry."

Hardman, who died last May at the age of 96, moved to Downs, Kan., with her family when she was 17. After graduating from K-State with a bachelor's degree, she moved back to Downs to work at her family's business, Hardman Lumber Co., and lived there until her death.

By the time it was sold in 1990, Hardman Lumber Co. had expanded to cover more than 40 retail outlets in Kansas, eastern Colorado and southern Nebraska.

Jerry J. Berkley, estate administrator, said he was a friend and confidante of Hardman for several years. "She certainly wanted to take care of women who had an interest in the aviation program," Berkley said.

Wefald said he thought the endowment was a great breakthrough for K-State-Salina, and he said it will attract top-notch females.

"When you stop to think of the critical need that's going to be there for pilots in the next 10 to 15 years, the demand for pilots for commercial aviation is going to be huge in the next decade," he said. "And given our aviation program at Salina, I don't think we'll be able to train enough pilots, male or female, so this is a huge advantage for K-State-Salina."

Owner of Dr. Love's dies of cancer

LORY STONE
Kansas State Collegian

William T. Love, owner of Dr. Love's, a seafood and exotic dancing establishment, died Wednesday at Irwin Army Community Hospital.

Page Getz, a dancer at Dr. Love's, said he died from cancer of the colon that had spread to his liver.

"He was supposed to fly to Texas for surgery Saturday, but he didn't make it," Getz said.

Getz said Dr. Love's, on Kansas Highway 18, west of Manhattan, opened in 1982. She said Love frequented his establishment every day.

"He set the atmosphere. Out of all the places I've worked, Dr. Love's was the most laid back and real. I don't feel like I'm working in a strip bar," Getz said.

Getz said Love's reputation was widespread throughout the area.

"There is probably no one in town who doesn't know

Ex-Student Senate chair, professor receive commendation for efforts on honor code

Former Student Senate Chair Jeff Dougan and Professor Mitchell Strauss were commended at Student Senate on Thursday evening for their hard work and dedication to the Academic Honor Code, which was passed by Faculty Senate on Tuesday.

During open period, Dougan expressed his thanks for the recognition.

"Thank you in advance for it, if you see fit to pass it," he said.

The resolution passed unanimously.

Faculty Representative to Senate Phil Anderson also commended Dougan and Strauss and the entire Senate body.

"You led the way on this issue," he said. "Faculty Senate had serious reservations on this issue, wondering if we could actually implement it and make it work.

"You won a big one. I'm really proud of being a senator in this body as a result of that," Anderson said.

New student senators started their orientation before the regular Senate meeting Thursday evening.

Business Sen. Jeremy Lutz said the senators learned a lot in the training session.

"We talked about the different kind of chairs and committees and what they did, just a general overview of their positions," he said.

Lutz said Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco spoke to the new senators about the Student Governing Association.

"Dr. Bosco gave a speech and talked about the history of the SGA office and how proud we should be to be a senator," Lutz said.

The fourth annual Creation and Creativity Conference, "In God's Eye," will begin tonight at 7:30 and last until 9. It will continue Saturday morning at 9 a.m. at the Quiet Garden in Keats, Kan.

"The purpose of the conference is to encourage people who want to integrate Christian faith with artistic pursuits, and to offer a day on the prairie for all," said the Rev. Cathy Chittenden-Bascom, minister with St. Francis Canterbury Fellowship, which is sponsoring the conference.

There will be three workshops on Saturday for visual artists, musicians and writers. Participants are encouraged to bring existing works of art, though no experience is required.

This year's conference features Chicago portrait artist and instructor Kristy Pokorny, who will give the opening speech and lead an afternoon workshop on visual art.

Blues guitarist Eric Bredeson will lead a workshop for song writers, and Tim Bascom, poet and novelist, will lead a workshop on writing narrative nonfiction.

The cost for the conference is $12 for adults and $6 for students. Free child care also is available.

Wichita man given death sentence, says state would profit if his life were spared

WICHITA — Michael Marsh, convicted of killing his former best friend's wife and child, on Thursday became the second person in Kansas to be sentenced to death since the state reinstated the punishment in 1994.

Before he was sentenced, Marsh told the court his execution would not bring back his victims.

"I know I owe society something for my involvement in this tragic crime," he said.

"If it is my life, I then yield."

He also said he believed the state would profit more if his life were spared, and he urged Judge Clark Owens to follow a moral standard of decency that he ignored.

"I just hope this court doesn't make the same mistake I did."

He did not show any visible response when Owens sentenced him to death.

After the sentencing, Marsh, dressed in a red jail jumpsuit, was handcuffed and led away.

He also was sentenced Thursday to life in prison with at least 40 years served without parole for the first-degree murder charge, more than four years for aggravated arson and just less than three years for aggravated burglary, all the maximum penalties allowed under law.

Before the sentencing, Owens said he had seen no trace of remorse from Marsh.

"He seemed to be rather flippant," he said.

Eric Pusch, the father and husband of the two victims, said during the hearing that he had everything he needed on June 17, 1996 — a wife, a daughter and what he thought was a friend.

But prosecutors said Marsh shot and stabbed 22-year-old Marry Ane Pusch at her home that day, then set a fire, leaving 19-month-old Marry Elizabeth trapped in the burning house with her mother's body. The toddler was rescued but died six days later.

"He did it just because he wanted to be God," said Pusch, who used to be best friends with Marsh. Pusch ended his court statement by saying he thought it was time for Marsh to meet God.

Craig Dittmar, Marry Ane Pusch's father, said after the sentencing that he didn't care whether Marsh received the death penalty or life in prison.

He said it was in God's hands.

Defense attorney Ron Wurtz said in court, "To make a decision to execute someone ... it is not one I would wish on anyone."

But prosecutor James Puntch called Marsh a predator and asked for the maximum penalty under law.

A Sedgwick County jury recommended the death penalty for the 22-year-old Marsh on Jan. 12. He was convicted Dec. 30 of capital murder, first-degree murder, aggravated arson and aggravated burglary.

On March 11, convicted murderer Gary Kleypas became the first person to be condemned to die under the state's 4-year-old death penalty law. Last year, a Wyandotte County jury convicted Kleypas in the Crawford County killing of Carrie Williams, a 20-year-old Pittsburg State University student.

In the Marsh case, the defense said he went to the Pusch home to rob the family, then panicked and shot Marry Ane Pusch when she arrived home.

Marsh admitted shooting Marry Ane Pusch once but could not remember shooting her again, slashing her throat and stabbing her, as prosecutors contend. Defense attorneys said he also did not set the fire that eventually killed the little girl.

But during his statement on Thursday, Marsh seemed to admit killing both, saying, "There is no amount of punishment that can be enforced upon me which can reverse the outcome of this crime. Likewise, there are truly no magic words to make my victims return to life."

The defense introduced evidence that suggested Eric Pusch had a part in the killings. Witnesses testified that Pusch had said his wife and daughter were worth more to him dead than alive.

Prosecutors had said Pusch was washing dirty pizza pans at the time Marsh was killing his wife and setting his home on fire and could not have helped in the crime. They also reminded jurors of Marsh's confession, in which he repeatedly denied that anyone else, including Pusch, was involved in the crime.

Training to promote cultural understanding

LORY STONE
Kansas State Collegian

The American Ethnic Studies Student Association is sponsoring a training session to promote multicultural awareness and unity from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Saturday in Union Station.

Juanita McGowan, assistant professor of sociology, anthropology and social work, said the session, with the theme "Unity by Understanding," will serve to promote awareness of multicultural issues.

"The Student Diversity Leadership Initiative will help to create multicultural leaders who will make a difference on the campus community," McGowan said.

She said the session consists of three basic areas of study.

The first emphasizes understanding culture and ethnic identity.

The second analyzes positive intergroup relations.

The third focuses on both individual action planning and collective action planning.

"We want individuals to what particular groups can contribute to the community," McGowan said.

Todd Nicewonger, president of the American Ethnic Studies Student Association and sophomore in speech, said he was enthusiastic for the training.

"We are trying to bring student leaders together to form a coalition for the advancement of diversity," Nicewonger said.

He said Saturday's session is the second rung of a five-part workshop.

The first phase was an orientation emphasizing motivation.

The second phase is an all-day workshop.

Action will be organized in the third phase.

The next phase will utilize the action step in more extensive training.

The final phase will be in the form of an all-university conference that will take place in November 1999.

"The training will focus on leadership, intercultural competency, skill training, linking student voices and celebrating uniqueness as well as commonalities," Nicewonger said.

Nicewonger said there will be three motivational speakers Saturday. The speakers include Scott Vernon, a national consultant and agriculture professor at California Polytechnic University; Susan Leahy, the student body president of the University of California at Pomona; and McGowan.

Nicewonger said much of the campus will be participating in the event.

"The training is not as academic and scholarly as it sounds. It is really just a lot of fun," Nicewonger said.

Dances, crafts put on display at powwow on Saturday

ANDREW WIMMER
Kansas State Collegian

Ahearn Field House will fill with the sights and sounds of American Indian culture from 1 to 10 p.m Saturday.

The 10th annual Spring Pow Wow is in honor of K-State's American Indian alumni.

The festival will include dancing and arts and crafts.

It is open to the public for $1. Doors open at noon for participants, vendors and spectators to set up.

Festivities begin at 1 p.m. with gourd dancing until 3 p.m. From 3 to 5 p.m., there will be a grand entry and junior-division dance contest, with those from ages 1 through 17 participating.

Tamara Goodson, president of the Native American Student Body, said the grand entry, where dancers are fully dressed in their regalia, is the highlight of the festival's beginning. She said the grand entry will be colorful and spectacular.

From 5 to 6:30 p.m. there will be a dinner break, and from 6:30 to 7:30 p.m. the senior division will have its grand entry, with the division dance contest from 8 to 10 p.m.

An awards ceremony will conclude the day's events and will begin at 10 or 10:30 p.m.

Goodson said Rusty Cozad, of the nationally known Cozad Family Singers, will be the event's lead singer.

Donald Bread will be master of ceremonies, and Terry Tsotigh will be the arena director and head dancing judge.

To find out more about the 10th annual Spring Pow Wow, call Tamara Goodson at 537-9719.

Arlene Harrison, Mrs. Kickapoo Pow Wow Princess 1997-98, will be the ladies' head dancer.

"We expect about 500 people to turn out for the event," Goodson said.

The event is sponsored by the Native American Student Body, the Student Governing Association, the Multicultural Student Association, the Diversity in Dual Career Development Office and the Kansas Arts Commission.

Athletic department sells out fans with 'Plan 2000'

Max Urick and the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics should resist the urge to treat fans like cash cows by trading in longtime support for big-money donors.

The proposed "Plan 2000" would rearrange and assign public season-ticket holders giving priority to financial contributors.

The athletic department is running a business, but hopefully, this embarrassing foray into corporate mentality won't gain a choke hold. A tradition built on enduring hope and genuine enthusiasm cannot not be sold off to the highest bidder.

From the field, KSU Stadium might seem like a sea of indistinguishable faces, but in reality, communities have formed. There is a formidable wall of standing students.

For parents who sit with their friends from college, every home game is an impromptu reunion. Other relationships have been built over seasons of cheering together and sharing the pride of those first precious winning seasons.

A desire to reward big-money donors and bandwagon fans should not be allowed to overshadow the secret weapon the K-State football team has found in die-hard supporters.

Yes, longtime season-ticket holders will have an opportunity to move into better seating based on contributions and seniority. Not only does this plan seem to value financial support more than actual fans, but it serves as a slap in the face to fans who stood through the winless seasons.

It might be a trend for the athletic departments of great football teams to become big-business dollar-crunchers. But K-State's success story isn't just about one coach and great players, it's about fans who have become a part of the team.

This proposed "Plan 2000" is not only bad business; it rejects common sense. By constantly upping the ante to ensure parking places or good seats, the athletic department is breeding an element of resentment.

Strong-arm tactics are not the best way to increase revenue from longtime ticket holders.

Worst of all, the proposed decision to determine season seat location by the amount of money donated to the Mike Ahearn Scholarship Fund is manipulative.

Donations are supposed to be voluntary, and this determination means the athletic department can cajole dedicated supporters into paying more for their tickets.

The athletic department praises fan support and trumpets incredible bowl game turnout, but actions speak louder than words.

The success of the team is owed to the actions of individual people. Great coaches, accomplished athletes and dedicated fans all play a vital role.

Dollar signs and additional zeros cannot take the place of fans who have attended every home game for years for reasons money cannot buy.

Yearlong trip to Germany involves adjustments, including an increase in number of pigs soaked

MARNY BURKE/Collegian

VIEWPOINT

BRANDI HERTIG

Brandi is a junior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Brandi at blh0377@ksu.edu.

For those of you who angrily have burned the Collegian every time my face appeared in it, I have some excellent news. As for the three of you who have enjoyed my sweet little vignettes on life over the past year, maybe you should start looking for another columnist to base your entire religion around. (I hear Sam Sackett's looking.)

Come August, I'll be on my way to Germany for a year to do volunteer work through the Intermenno Trainee Program, an organization of the Mennonite Central Committee. A place where I'll be free to not shave a single hair off my body. A place where I can buy hard liquor along with produce items at the grocery store. A place where they don't speak English and where the only water available is carbonated.

I guess you could say I'm scared. I'm worried the family I'll end up with will make me eat bratwurst. I'm worried the job I'll get will involve washing the pigs. I'm worried I'll be thirsty the entire year.

Germany is far removed from any culture with which I grew up. Hell, the country is far removed from any state in which I grew up. Things are just different there. You don't get free refills on pop in restaurants. People wear less clothing. Sales clerks don't always have to be nice. And there's techno, techno, techno around every corner.

It doesn't help that I'm a relatively ignorant Kansas girl. When I was in Berlin for a few days, I thought men shooting up heroin in the women's public restrooms was a German thing, not a big city thing. Berlin was (and still is) the biggest city I've ever been to. How was I supposed to know that probably goes on in all sorts of places?

Don't get me wrong — I do want to go. In theory. I'm sure I'd regret it if I backed out (which actually isn't an option anymore). After all, it's only about 1/80th of my life (or 1/19th if I happen to get run over by a Strassenbahn upon arrival). Plus, everyone should make some big sacrifices to help others every once in a while. It's not that I'd expect a German to come over here to wash my pigs, but I think you know what I mean.

We all have parts of our lives that we look back on, slap ourselves on the forehead and wonder what the hell we were thinking. Yours truly has quite an extended list, going all the way back to a second-grade crush on Kirk Cameron. Personally, I'd like to retard the expansion of said list and make the list of things I have no regrets about a little longer.

As of right now (and this is subject to change on an hourly basis), I'm looking forward to skipping the country for a year. No school, no Dillons, no Collegian, no bills to pay. No one stopping me to say, "Don't you write for the Collegian? Yeah. I've read your columns." Fantastic.

This is a good time in our lives. Many of us only are tied down by school, something that can be put off for a year (and I know that makes some of you cringe, but what's your hurry to be a full-fledged adult? After this, you won't be getting any more movie discounts until you're 65). Granted, it's not easy to give up the comfort of familiarity, but it's got to be worth it. And you never know — you might learn more spending a year in a foreign country than you would sitting through classes.

Don't wait for the opportunity to come to you. Seek it out. If you happen to be traversing through Europe next year, please stop by Germany and throw some normal water my way for me and my soapy pig.

Taxing tobacco intends to slow its use, not eliminate valuable revenue source

VIEWPOINT

SAM SACKETT

Sam is a sophomore in public relations. You can send e-mail to Sam at sjs8645@ksu.edu.

"TO CONSIDER OBJECTIVELY WHAT IS HAPPENING, YOU MUST THINK, NOT FEEL. WRONG IS NOT WRONG BECAUSE YOU FEEL SO."

Many conservatives have joined liberals in a holy crusade to punish tobacco companies by increasing taxes on cigarettes. The proposed McCain bill would increase taxes by $1.10 per pack.

This sin tax raises serious questions in my mind about the government's intentions and specific actions regarding tobacco products.

If tobacco is indeed harmful to our society, then why are we taxing it? Should we not ban it completely, instead? If something is harmful, you don't keep it around and tax it, you eliminate it. This is not what is happening.

Instead, a deliberate scheme is being constructed to generate more income for a money-hungry government. And politics is stirring anti-tobacco feelings in the public to justify its actions.

Washington, D.C., is not interested in eliminating tobacco. It generates too much revenue. But the ultimate intention is stated best by President Clinton: "This is about changing the behavior of the United States ... the behavior of the American people."

In attempting to understand the tobacco issue, you must put your feelings aside. To consider objectively what should be done and what is happening you must think, not feel. Wrong is not wrong because you feel so. Other reasons exist.

The moment you leap into the protest against smoking, be sure of your motives. Before you join the anti-tobacco enthusiasts and start whining to Daddy Government about the evils of smoking, understand the core of your plea.

Your disagreement with someone's personal habits because you don't like them doesn't fit the criterion for implementing a crushing sin tax. While smoking tobacco might be unpleasant to you, endeavoring to force your preference on smokers is itself inconsiderate and wrong. Unless the public's health is in danger, it is none of your business if a person lights up a Camel.

When government meddles with our personal lives, in issues that do not burden or harm our society, then reasonable control is overstepping its boundaries.

Nonsmokers, if you still are convinced government should heavily tax tobacco companies, which in reality is a tax imposed upon smokers, remember that it might be you next. Just because you don't like to smoke doesn't mean that other people should conform to your choice of actions.

If cigarettes are damaging to one's personal health when used in excess and over a period of time, then the decision to smoke belongs to the smoker. Not government. And certainly not to nonsmokers.

It is simply another step toward eliminating our choices as free citizens and allowing government to make decisions for us. As if we aren't capable. Let the smoker decide between pleasure in the now and possible health illnesses in the future.

Overeating is probably as much of an 'evil' as regularly taking a draw on a Marlboro. But do you think government should add special taxes on candy bars and high-calorie foods? Consider the ills that result from obesity. This idea might sound absurd, but try to find root differences. Take the principle being applied to the tobacco issue and apply it to something you consider precious.

Once you separate yourself from the feeling part of the issue, you begin to see what is taking shape. Again, understand that the government does not want to get rid of the tobacco industry. It has too much money to lose in taxes. If tobacco executives were to announce suddenly that they were going to stop production of cigarettes, the government would go ballistic. Not the anti-smokers, but the government. Many politicians have rallied behind a feelings campaign. And it has fooled most people.

California recently passed legislation that bans smoking in bars. Why not let the private businesses decide for themselves if smoking is allowed in their buildings? If a bar wants to be smoke-free, let it make that decision itself.

I find it alarming that our government is attempting to exercise power against our freedoms with such public consent. Why aren't the smokers protesting louder?

If you are determined to eliminate smoking because you don't like it, don't choose government regulation and taxation. Reveal smoking's consequences through personal interactions with smokers. If smoking is detrimental to our society, then let's ban it completely. But as long as it is not deleterious, leave the smokers alone.

'Plan 2000' victimizes K-State's most loyal fans; money shouldn't be issue

Editor,

What happened to rewarding loyalty? Bob Cavello, business manager for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, said it was unjust that, "Right now, we have people who are sitting on the five-yard line who are giving $5,000, and people who are sitting on the 40-yard line are not giving anything." What happened to fairness?

Do you know why these people are sitting on the five-yard line? Because they did not support the football program even two years ago.

The only way you can be sitting on the five-yard line with season tickets is if you bought them within the past couple of years. These people are not loyal fans. They have not supported the football team in the past, and they will not support it in the future if the team has even one losing season.

"WHAT ABOUT THE PEOPLE WHO WENT TO THE GAMES WHEN THE TEAM NEVER WON A GAME? THESE ARE THE PEOPLE WHO SUPPORTED K-STATE IN ITS DARKEST HOUR, KEEPING THE FOOTBALL PROGRAM ALIVE UNTIL THE COMING OF BILL SNYDER."

What about the people who went to the games when the team never won a game? These are the people who supported K-State in its darkest hour, keeping the football program alive until the coming of Bill Snyder. But Cavello does not seem to care about these people.

Of course, it is hard for people making upwards of $100,000 a year to understand the costs involved with attending football games for the school and team you love. Urick said, "Fans who can afford to travel to bowl games generally can afford to contribute. That is not one of my concerns."

He does not have to concern himself with scrimping and saving so his family can attend the regular season games and go to the bowl game.

Most K-State graduates will tell you how they have to make tough choices to be able to afford to attend these events. But many gladly make these sacrifices because they love their school and the football team, win or lose.

However, now they are faced with another tough choice: How much do I have to give to the Ahearn fund to maintain my current seats? $500? $1,000? $5,000? Who knows? It is an auction, with the best seats going to the highest bidder. Only the rich will have the good seats.

If that is what the athletic department wants, that is what they will get. Forty-thousand rich people sitting on their hands between the 20-yard lines, creating the quietest stadium in the Big 12. All the while the rest of us poor saps will be sitting in the end zones guarding our wallets from the pick-pockets in the athletic department.

Please reassess this "Plan 2000." If you need more money, raise the ticket prices.

Do not make us guess how much we need to donate. It is a sad day when K-State graduates who want to attend football games cannot because they cannot afford it.

Remember, we are on the verge of a national championship with one of the smallest athletic budgets in the country. Money does not necessarily win championships (recent Notre Dame wins come to mind). Dedication, desire, hard work and loyalty all win championships. Money is only one part of the equation.

Donor story deserves more attention, play than marijuana piece

Editor,

First, I would like to thank all of those who got tested at the Mike Meier Bone Marrow drive. I am glad it has saved one person's life. Mike, also, would have been pleased. I never knew of the bone marrow transplant until I was tested to see if I could be a donor for my brother. Even though I did not match, I was put into the registry and was called to get the second test a few years back. I would hope the person needing that transplant got it and is living a regular, fulfilling life today.

Next, I know that smoking dope is a real necessity on campus and deserved a full page column while possibly saving someone's life is not quite as important. I don't know if it was the Alumni Board not supplying the Collegian with any more information or if the Collegian did not run a larger editorial than they did because of space considerations.

However, I felt that this drive was more deserving of a story that described what the need was, why it was started and possibly some statistics. You see, I am Mike's brother and even though it is too late to save my brother's life it may not be too late for someone you know and love. If anyone would like more information, please call 1-800-MARROW2 or 1-800-366-6710.

Other campus areas in dire need of lights for pedestrian safety

Editor,

I am writing to express my concern about the timing of KSU's crosswalk lighting projects. I find it a bit disturbing that this issue has only been raised since a KSU student was recently injured crossing the street in a poorly lit crosswalk late at night. She was struck near Platt Street on Denison Avenue. Coincidentally, money has shown up out of nowhere to pay for the lighting of this crosswalk.

Does someone need to be injured at the crosswalk located at Vattier Street and Manhattan Avenue before KSU coughs up the money to get better lighting? What about the crosswalk outside of Umberger Hall?

KSU needs to stop the problem before someone else gets hurt. A student's life is worth the extra effort.

Despite huge strides, prejudice remains strong all around us

Editor,

I must respond to Renee Hurla's letter to the editor in Tuesday's Collegian, and to Aaron Austin's response to her letter on Wednesday, both in regard to Santos Ramirez' article on Monday and earlier ones this semester. Both Ms. Hurla and Mr. Austin make good points, but miss others.

I agree with Ms. Hurla that everyone should take more responsibility for their own life. That is as true for the dominant group as it is for others. Whining seems to have become a favored strategy for dealing with grades, for getting out of responsibilities and for placing the blame on anyone but ourselves. But your objection to whining missed the point of Mr. Ramirez's articles.

I grew up in Taos, and some 70 percent of the population was "Spanish" (as they used to call themselves). My family, like perhaps 25 percent of the residents, was "Anglo."

When I was 10 years of age, I began to notice that I was treated very differently from my friends, nearly all of whom were of Spanish/Mexican descent. I noticed, for example, that teachers often ignored them in class, rarely called on them and prejudged their intellectual and social abilities as "deficient." Some of those teachers were Latino.

I noticed that high school counselors advised them to go into shop or auto mechanics, that because they were "Mexican" they would never make it to college. In the stores, I noticed that my friends would be followed by the sales staff. I noticed that my friends got pulled over regularly by the police, while I never did once. I noticed that, as valedictorian of my high school class, I won many awards, while very few of my friends did so.

None of this was due to differences in intelligence, trustworthiness, or basic goodness. Many of my friends were intelligent and some were more so. But the system created by my ancestors that is invisible to us, was very visible to them. Cultural expectations are different, neither better or worse, just different.

Of course everything we learn after that, in the academic setting is learned through our first language and culture.

I have heard students, staff and faculty speak of diversity as a "non-issue." Very true for them, for whom the system is so transparent that they cannot even see it. Not so for others, who, today in Manhattan, are going through the same things my friends went through 40 years ago. Follow an African-American or Latino around Manhattan Town Center and watch what happens to them in stores. Watch what happens in some classes where women, students of color and international students are ignored, or asked to "represent" their entire culture. (Could you speak about the effects of the Civil War on dominant-group culture in the United States, or explain our culture to others?)

In Monday's paper, Mr. Ramirez addressed the fact that high school counselors and teachers are still doing what I saw as a child. In my high school graduating class of 124, fewer than 10 percent of Latino students went to college, while nearly 50 percent of Anglo students did. Now that counselors and teachers have stopped saying those stupid things to Latino students, the percentages are nearly equal, as is the success rate.

When students from any background are the first in their families to attend college, the advice of high school counselors seems believable. This is changing in Kansas, but not fast enough. We need to insist that this kind of discrimination on the part of teachers and counselors stops, and stops now, both in the high schools and on this campus.

We are all racists, we are all sexists, we are all homophobic. The system is all around us, and it reinforces those stereotypes at every moment. But we do have ways to fight it, ways to refuse to participate in it, ways to "talk ourselves out of the stereotypes," as I do at the beginning of every class I teach. We have ways to open the doors to all, and to learn to work and live together.

What have you done this week? Have you ignored the problem as a "non-issue;" i.e., have you perpetuated the system? Have you in fact practiced prejudice and discrimination, even without intending to? Or have you consciously worked to begin to break down these barriers, to try to meet and treat all as equals, and to denounce the prejudice you profess to see around you?

Royals recall Rios, move Hansen

OAKLAND, Calif. — The Kansas City Royals recalled right-handed pitcher Danny Rios from Omaha, Neb., of the Pacific Coast League on Thursday and optioned infielder Jed Hansen to Omaha.

Rios, claimed on waivers from the New York Yankees on March 26, did not allow any earned runs in three relief appearances at Omaha.

Hansen had just three at-bats this season for the Royals, striking out all three times.

Renovations ready to take place at Yankee Stadium this weekend

NEW YORK — Inspectors at Yankee Stadium began examining the ballpark's facade Thursday while the team prepared to leave its shuttered ballpark for an unexpected road trip to Detroit.

Engineers want to look for more water-damaged cement, which could flake off and hit people below.

The stadium, which opened 75 years ago Saturday, has been closed since a 500-pound steel-and-concrete joint fell and flattened seats in the middle deck hours before the scheduled game with Anaheim on Monday. No one was in the stands at the time.

Since then, a top-to-bottom examination of the stadium turned up damage from seeping water in the facade, which dates from a 1974-75 remodeling. Officials have said the damage is cosmetic and does not affect structural stability.

Sunny Mindel, speaking for the mayor's Office of Emergency Management, said eight 32-foot scaffolds had been built on hydraulic lifts and will be rotated around the stadium's exterior. Inspectors will tap the wall with hammers looking for places where concrete might have been loosened by seepage that froze and melted.

The workers will excavate loose concrete, then return later to fill in the water-damaged areas, Mindel said.

Inspection of the rest of the stadium for structural damage and other wear and tear is nearly complete and inspectors have found no other significant problems, Mindel said.

"We anticipate that all the safety issues at the stadium will be fixed by Tuesday," she said. "And the cosmetic work, we hope, will be done by Wednesday, weather permitting."

Monday and Tuesday games against the Angels were postponed and the Wednesday game was played at Shea Stadium, the New York Mets' home. The Yankees won 6-3.

The Yankees' weekend home series with Tigers was switched to Detroit.

Yankee Stadium is expected to reopen April 24 for a three-game series originally scheduled to be played in Detroit.

The stadium's woes have increased pressure to resolve where the team will play after its lease expires in 2002.

A renovated Bronx ballpark, a new stadium on Manhattan's West Side or a move to New Jersey have been among the options.

Mayor Rudolph Giuliani said Wednesday that continuing problems with Yankee Stadium make it less likely he will support a renovation plan. Yankees owner George Steinbrenner said he expected the team's future to be settled this year.

The last detailed inspection of Yankee Stadium's structure was in 1979, when cracks appeared in the concrete. On Thursday, the Civil Service Technical Guild, representing city engineers, insisted that a properly maintained stadium would have been safe for many decades.

Instead, the group said, "we have a facility that has been milked for profits at public expense by an owner whose only interest is his bottom line."

Under the stadium's lease, the team is in charge of maintaining the stadium, with maintenance costs deducted from the rent the team pays the city. In recent years, that sum has totaled between $3.5 million and $4 million annually. According to the Parks Department, the city has spent an additional $13 million on capital improvements to the stadium since 1989.

Giuliani has said the city will begin detailed annual inspections of both Yankee Stadium and Shea Stadium.

LaFrentz, Pierce get top award at annual KU awards banquet

LAWRENCE — Departing All-American forwards Raef LaFrentz and Paul Pierce were named co-winners of the Forrest C. "Phog" Allen MVP Award Thursday night at Kansas' annual postseason banquet in Allen Fieldhouse.

The two were the first Jayhawks to be named first-team All Americans in the same season, and they won or shared six of the nine awards presented at the banquet.

LaFrentz, a senior, is expected to be a high first-round pick in the NBA draft in June. Pierce, a junior, announced earlier this month he would skip his senior year to enter the draft.

Forward T.J. Pugh was named best defensive player, while Billy Thomas was named the team's most improved player. Guards C.B. McGrath and Ryan Robertson and Pugh shared an award for academic achievement.

Gettin' jiggy with it

DARRELL HATFIELD, MANHATTAN RESIDENT, HAULS IN A WHITE CRAPPIE AT PFEIL CREEK BEHIND RIVER RAT BAIT SHOP NEAR THE TUTTLE CREEK DAM. HATFIELD THREW THIS PARTICULAR FISH BACK.

Northeast Kansas lures anglers to its lakes, shorelines

Jumping out of the clear blue waters, the sight of a largemouth bass brings a smile to the solitary figure standing on the edge of the lake.

It's fishing season again.

Luckily, northeast Kansas is an excellent place to be when the spring fishing bug bites, especially if you know where to go and when.

Tuttle Creek Reservoir is an obvious choice. Its proximity to Manhattan, miles of shoreline, good variation in habitat and a plethora of fish species to choose from make it a great reservoir to explore with a fishing rod.

The first solid opportunity to catch fish is during late April and the first part of May when white bass make their spawning run in the tributaries of Tuttle Creek. Chuck Bever, a fish biologist who works daily around Tuttle Creek and its tributaries, said white bass will begin spawning when the water temperature is between 55 and 60 degrees, and it warms quickest in river shallows such as the ones around Rocky Ford Fishing Area.

Located a couple miles below the dam northeast of Manhattan, Rocky Ford is a good place to catch whites in the shallows of the Blue River — if you're willing to get your feet wet and don't mind fishing with a crowd of other people. Small, one-eigth ounce marabou jigs and a spinning rod are all you need, and it works best to wade into the current a few yards so you can cast the jigs where the fish are. Look for clear water too, because a lot of water is being released into the river now, making for muddy conditions and tough fishing until it clears up.

But spring river fishing doesn't have to be limited to populated spots such as Rocky Ford, and for people who prefer their fishing line to be the only one in sight, there are other opportunities.

Several more out-of-the-way tributaries feed into Tuttle Creek and have good fishing. All it takes is asking the local experts a few questions and exploring the area. Fancy Creek is one of those spots, and it might take some trial and error before finding a stretch of water and fishing method that works.

A couple of rules to follow when fishing currents such as Fancy Creek: Look for fast-moving water that is deep enough to hold fish and, unlike fishing for catfish, fish the area above the riffle in the current, not below.

About the same time white bass fishing heats up, the crappie fishing improves, too. Bever said crappie begin to spawn at the end of April and the first part of May when the water temperature rises to between 60 and 65 degrees. Crappie already are being caught close to the Blue River behind River Rat Bait Shop near the dam, and fishing should be good on the north end of Tuttle Creek. Another good place for crappie fishing along the shore is Girl Scout Cove.

Specific directions would spoil all the fun of finding the cove, but a couple of hints are necessary. It's south of Randolph, Neb., off of state Highway 177 near [illegible]'ll need plenty of minnows.

When crappie fishing gets tiresome, and when the white bass move into the main lake as summer approaches and begin taunting shoreline anglers who only can drool on the sand as they watch top water feeding frenzies that are just out of reach, don't get discouraged. As many people familiar with the hundreds of farm ponds tucked into the flint hills already know, the fun is just beginning.

Toward the end of May and especially during June, the largemouth bass fishing in remote ponds around Manhattan and northeast Kansas is some of the best in the state. The tough part is finding a good pond and a generous landowner.

All of them are on private property, so you have to ask permission before fishing one. Tact, respect and politeness toward the landowner are a big help here.

Track members to run up against world-class competition

JOEL WHITE
Kansas State Collegian

Six members of the K-State track team will have the chance to measure themselves against world-class competition this weekend at the Mt. SAC Relays in Walnut, Calif.

High jumpers Charles Burney and Nathan Leeper, hammer throwers Renetta Seiler and Anna Whitham, and middle-distance runners Istvan Nagy and Scott Galas will compete at the Mt. SAC Relays.

K-State coach Cliff Rovelto said Leeper has been jumping consistently well — his season's best is 7-4 1/2 — but Burney has not because of a bad hamstring.

"Charles has had a sore hamstring that's bothered him, but I think he's over that now," he said.

Burney's best jump of the outdoor season is 6-11 3/4, but he cleared 7-4 1/2 several times during the indoor season. He said he has recovered from his slight hamstring pull and is ready to be back to his old self.

"I pulled it in February, and I kept ignoring it, but it kept getting worse," Burney said. "I sat out a week, and I'm ready now."

Burney said he has had not only to recover physically, but he also had to change his mentality during competition.

"It was more mental than physical," Burney said. "I was thinking too much instead of executing, and I kept getting more and more down on myself."

Although Burney said he thinks he will be back into his previous form, he said expecting to win the Mt. SAC high jump, in which last year's winning height was 7-8, would be unrealistic.

"We're jumping against world-class and top collegiates," Burney said. "I know you can't go out there and jump 7-2 and win it."

Rovelto said he agreed Mt. SAC will have plenty of world-class performances.

"This meet will probably have as many events with outstanding performances as any meet in the season," Rovelto said.

One of the most competitive events at the relays could be the women's invitational hammer. Amy Palmer of BYU, the nation's No. 1 thrower, will be there along with Seiler, who is ranked second with a throw of 207-6.

"That has been one of the few meets where there has been a hammer contested," Rovelto said. "It's a pretty good place for people to hook up."

Whitham will be competing in the University hammer.

Both Nagy and Galas will be running in the University 800. Nagy's best 800-meter time this season is 1:51.25, and Galas' best time this season is 1:51.41.

Former Wildcats Nicole Green, Gwen Wentland and Jill Montgomery also will be competing at Mt. SAC this week. Green, the 1995 NCAA 400-meter dash champion, will compete in the 400- and 1,600-meter relays as well as in the 400 for Nike. Wentland, who also competes for Nike, will be in the high jump. Montgomery will compete in the heptathlon and pole vault for Accusplit.

Recent action by Chicago Blackhawks in playoffs much like life of columnist

VIEWPOINT

DAN MERKER

Dan is a sophomore in computer science. You can send e-mail to Dan at dmerker@ksu.edu

Sports are a wonderful metaphor for life. I just found out that I am amazingly like the Chicago Blackhawks.

With the NHL regular season wrapping up this weekend, 16 teams will play to get their names on the Stanley Cup, and 10 will be hitting the golf courses early. Wednesday night, we found out officially which 10 will be perfecting their golf games in time for all the celebrity tournaments.

Among those 10 teams was the Chicago Blackhawks, one of the most successful organizations in the NHL. It was one of the original six teams when the NHL started 81 years ago. Its brethren, the Toronto Maple Leafs and New York Rangers, will be joining it on the golf course.

The Blackhawks had the longest streak of consecutive years in the playoffs at 28, but that was snapped when they lost to Toronto and the San Jose Sharks tied the Calgary Flames to clinch a berth.

The sad thing is the Blackhawks are definitely one of the eight most talented teams in the Western Conference. They're better than Los Angeles, San Jose and Edmonton, but they didn't do the job. Now, hockey's longest current streak since their last Stanley Cup will be extended by another year.

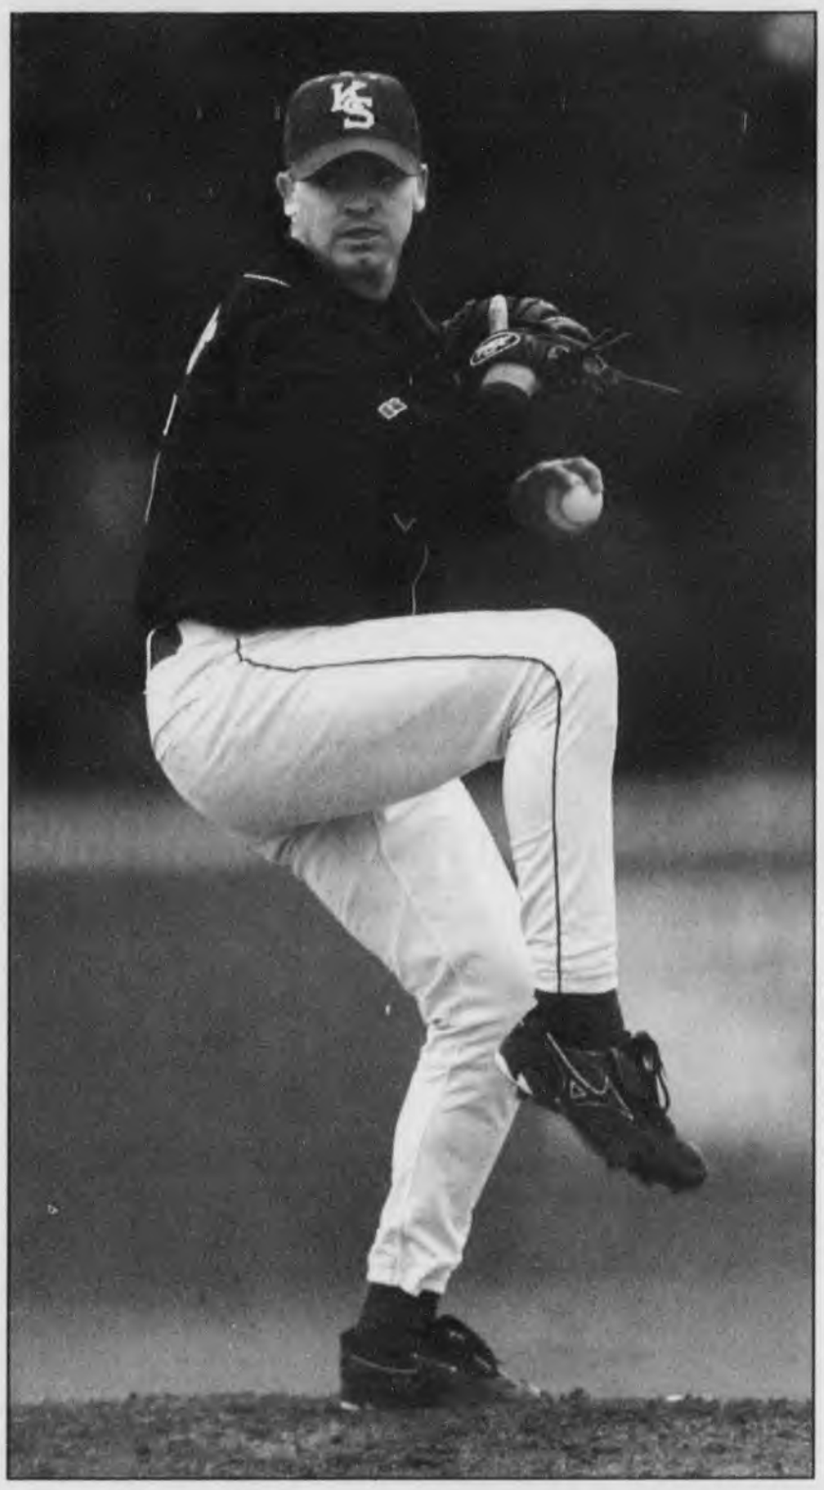
It looked as though the Blackhawks would rally to make the playoffs, but a recent four-game losing streak brought their demise. They found out the hard way that it's a lot easier to get wins early in the season than to try to make them up and chase teams late. An 0-7 start killed them.

Even though they're just one game below .500 since that start, that caused them to miss the playoffs. Wins are worth just as much early in the season as they are late, but are easier to find.

I am the Blackhawks. Now, late in the semester with work piling up, I am figuring out that work done early in the semester makes life a lot easier, and that making up everything is not simple, especially because I have to do it in all my classes.

My procrastination is just like starting out 0-7. I dug myself into a hole I might not be able to get out of. I need to go on a decent winning streak to rally and gain that final playoff spot.

In hindsight, it would have been so much easier to do all my work when I had nothing pressing and deadlines weren't everywhere. When the weather wasn't nice, it would have been easy to do. Now, I must force myself to work against my will because things need to be done. The whole time ignoring the cries of my golf clubs.



Unfortunately, now I am finding out that sports mirror life perfectly. Hopefully, I'm not like the Chicago Cubs of a year ago, who dug themselves a hole they couldn't escape by starting 0-14. Hopefully, I'll be able to rally from a double-digit deficit in the loss column to force a playoff like the 1978 Yankees. Hopefully, Bucky Dent is on my team and will hit one over the Green Monster.

And hopefully, by paying attention to sports, I will learn from my academic mistakes and recover. Hopefully, I'll be like this year's Cubs and start 8-2 next year. Maybe I'll be like the K-State volleyball team and be able to survive a late five-game losing streak to still reach the NCAA Tournament.

Now I know progress early is just as effective as progress late, but it's a lot easier to do without the late-season pressure and scoreboard watching.

This year, I just didn't have the personnel early in the season, which in computer-ese means I didn't know Java. But I made a trade, and now that I have the right team, I think I'll be able to reach the playoffs.

Once you get there, anything can happen. Maybe I'll even be able to hoist the Stanley Cup.

Top-30 baseball team on deck for matchup against Wildcats

JEREMY KELLEY
Kansas State Collegian

After slipping past Bethany Wednesday, the K-State baseball team turns its focus toward No. 29 Cal-State Northridge.

This is the first-ever meeting between the two squads.

"It's perfect," K-State head coach Mike Clark said. "What a great opportunity for our club. Northridge is such a great baseball school, and it will be a good test for our kids."

This team is no pushover, either. The Matadors have won 16-straight games, its most recent win against No. 17 Long Beach State on Tuesday night. Among its 16-consecutive wins, Cal-State (28-19) has beaten UCLA twice in a home-and-home series, in addition to No. 18 Cal-State Fullerton.

Meanwhile, the Cats (14-20) are looking to gain momentum for the midweek series against No. 5 Baylor next week.

"We have to get ready to play Baylor next week," Clark said. "That's not to say we will look past this team.

"We need to work on some things this weekend, and this will be a good club to do that against. It should be a good series."

The Matadors have six players batting at a .300 clip or better. Second baseman Nakia Hill is hitting .514 through the past 16 games (36-70).

Clark said he wasn't really aware of individual players on the team, but he said he knew they could put up big numbers against great teams.

"They're a great club," he said. "If we don't play well it could turn into the Oklahoma series again."

K-State center fielder Eric Sommerhauser is in the midst of a nine-game hitting streak and will look to extend it this weekend.

"They're a good team, and they have some good pitchers," pitcher Chad Cosens said. "It will be a good challenge for our hitters. Hopefully, we can just make some nice pitches as well and play good defense."

The series between the two squads begins with a doubleheader today at 4 p.m. The twinbill will be a nine- and a seven-inning affair, with the latter game slated to start at 7 p.m.

Brandon Peck will take the mound in the first game. It will be Peck's 11th start of the season. Peck (3-3) last lost against Oklahoma on April 10 but is leading starters with an ERA of 4.29.

Mickey Blount will get the nod in the night cap. It is just Blount's fifth appearance of the year. Blount was nursing a shoulder injury toward the beginning of the season and didn't make his first appearance until March 23 against Howard.

The first pitch for Saturday's game is scheduled for 7 p.m., and the final game on Sunday afternoon will begin at 1 p.m.

Tennis team to swing for victory

DAN CATALDI
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State tennis team closes out its regular season schedule on Saturday as it does battle with the Nebraska Cornhuskers in Lincoln.

The Wildcats are on a three-meet winning streak after they closed out their home schedule with consecutive wins over Oklahoma State, Missouri and Baylor.

Coach Steve Bietau said he attributes the team's recent success to the outstanding play of his players in singles.

"Yana (Dorodnova) is continuing to play well. Dinah (Watson) is also playing very well," he said. "Martina (Pospisilova) has played better and shown improvement in the last two weeks."

The win over Baylor on Monday was an important one for the Cats, because the Bears had only one conference loss to that point.

While the Cats have been playing well, Bietau said he sees plenty of room for improvement.

"Overall, we've played pretty well in singles," he said. "But, we need improvements in doubles. We are capable of playing significantly better than we are right now."

At No. 1 singles, Dorodnova said she hopes to close out her regular-season career with a victory. She is ranked No. 44 in the nation and has posted a 14-4 overall mark (6-2 in the Big 12) this year.

This includes several key victories, such as a win over Holly Parkinson from BYU, the No. 5 player in the nation. Dorodnova also was named the Big 12 Conference Player of the Week once in March.

A win against Nebraska would give the Cats a 10-10 overall record for the season, keeping them from finishing below .500. It also would ensure a winning record in the Big 12 Conference by allowing the Cats to finish at 6-5.

This would be a big improvement for the Cats, who finished 7-14 last season with a 2-9 Big 12 Conference mark.

This meet also is important in the seedings for the Big 12 Tournament, as Nebraska is right behind K-State for the sixth spot in the current standings.

"Every match this time of year is important for us," Bietau said.

The meet is scheduled for noon, and the forecast is for sunny and cool weather.

Lake hooks anglers on big fish, even bigger fish stories have a fishing rod handy, is all it takes to know whether it is worth fishing. First, make sure that the water is clear. It helps if the pond is fed by a natural spring, and if the water has a brown, muddy look, chances are you won't catch fish even if there are some in the pond.

Depth also is important. If it covers a lot of area it is probably deep enough — it should be at least six feet deep in the middle, but guessing the depth is tough. The best indicator is the first several feet of the water line. A shoreline with a gentle, gradual slope toward the center of the pond means it is probably too shallow. But if the shoreline is fairly steep and you can't see the bottom of the pond in clear water four or five feet from where you stand, chances are it's deep enough to hold bass.

Also, look at the underwater habitat. Aquatic plants that grow up from the bottom of the pond are a good sign because they provide cover and a nesting area for female bass. And if perch and bluegill are meandering visibly among the weeds, that is the best sign of all.

Lures are a matter of personal choice, but it's easy to get caught up in all the high-priced trinkets that are available. Keep it simple. Bass are aggressive, but finicky as well. A slight change in water temperature or the weather is enough to keep largemouths from biting, not usually the type of lure that is used. This is especially true during the spring when female bass are protecting their eggs from pesky bluegills and will attack anything to protect their domain. If you want to catch largemouths, bluegill and anything else that might be in the water, tie on a simple spinner like a Mepps Aglia No. 1, and you'll be surprised at the variety of fish you catch.

Cast placement and an eye for "fishy" spots is more important when largemouth fishing. Look for weed beds and standing structures such as tree stumps to cast along, and try varying your line retrieve from time to time.

It doesn't matter if you're fishing for crappie near a brush pile, walleye near a rocky point, white bass in a stream or largemouths in an unknown farm pond — trying new locations and techniques never gets old. As you do, the fishing will probably improve, but maybe it won't.

Sometimes it doesn't matter. The good spots don't make you think of the number of fish you caught on the drive home.

'Eligible Receiver' exposes Defense flaws

▶ HACKERS' GAME SHOWS COMPUTERS VULNERABLE TO OUTSIDE INTRUDERS.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Hiding behind anonymous keyboard clicks, a group of hackers struggled for two weeks to breach U.S. military and civilian computer networks.

They succeeded beyond their wildest dreams, the Pentagon said Thursday.

The culprits: a special U.S. national security team that secretly was testing the vulnerability of the nation's computer system using software found on the Internet.

Code-named "Eligible Receiver," the cyberwar game proved what the Defense Department said it has long known — its computers are susceptible targets, which became clear earlier this year when real hackers made a systematic attack.

"It found that we have a lot of work to do to provide better security," Pentagon spokesman Ken Bacon said of the cyberwar game last June, which went after unclassified computer systems.

"We're not alone in this regard."

The Pentagon plans to spend nearly $1 billion a year for the next several years to improve its classified and unclassified computer security, Bacon said, noting the department has 2.1 million computers.

Deputy Defense Secretary John Hamre is shepherding a stepped-up anti-hacker program that includes a counterintelligence effort to stop intruders before they get through the electronic door, the Pentagon said.

In the cyberwar game, more than 50 National Security Agency hackers gained access to computer systems across the country, according to the Pentagon, including the U.S. Pacific Command in Hawaii, which oversees 100,000 troops in Asia.

The hackers gained access to a U.S. electric power grid system they could have sabotaged to plunge the nation into darkness as well — something Pentagon officials said likely would be a tactic of any real cyberwar aimed at shutting down the nation's public works.

Some hackers posed as operatives for North Korea and only one unit was tracked by the FBI, which works with the Pentagon to catch computer criminals.

"'Eligible Receiver,' I think, has succeeded beyond its planners' wildest dreams in elevating the awareness of threats to our computer systems," Bacon said.

Classified computers weren't part of the cyberwar game.

In the most recent case of real Pentagon hacking, a teen-ager in Israel, nicknamed "The Analyzer" on the Internet, is being investigated by the Israeli police for his assault on the Defense Department and other computer systems earlier this year.

In February, Hamre said the Pentagon's unclassified computers were hit by the most organized and systematic attack to date, targeting mostly personnel records.

He said intrusions had all the appearances of a game and had the quality of voyeurism or vandalism committed by a small number of individuals.

"There are hackers that enjoy breaking into people's computers, just to see what they can see," he said, adding the Pentagon has some mystique.

Bacon joked that perhaps the military should look at home for answers.

"We're trying to do a much better job of staying in touch with our teenage children and others to learn the latest hacker techniques so we can be one step ahead of them rather than several steps behind," he said.

Simultaneous degrees available in joint program

SARA ZENGER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State and Manhattan Christian College work together to provide a dual-degree program that makes it possible for students to receive a degree from each college at the same time.

"K-State shows how versatile it is by being able to work with us," Scott Jenkins, admissions counselor at MCC, said. "It's just about like MCC is a branch of K-State."

Jenkins said the dual-degree program helps the college offer its students more options. For Mandy Jaggard, the opportunity to live in a Christian environment while preparing for her career makes the extra tuition and time worth it, she said.

"I knew I wanted to teach in a public school and knew I needed a secular degree from a public school to do that. But I also want to be involved in ministry someday and wanted to live in a Christian environment," said Jaggard, freshman in Christian service and secondary education.

"I think living in a Christian environment is really, really nice, especially during your freshman year when you're changing so much."

Jenkins said MCC has a special relationship with K-State.

"They accept our Bible courses. If someone took Old Testament here, it would transfer over as a humanities or history course. This allows students to complete two bachelor degrees in the short amount of time of five years," Jenkins said.

About 20 percent of MCC's student population is enrolled in the dual degree program. Most of these students earn a bachelor's degree in Christian service along with their K-State degree.

Jenkins said students can pursue almost any career area at K-State.

"We have 22 dual-degree programs set up now. We will be able to set it up with almost any degree at K-State within a year," Jenkins said.

"The only two colleges we can't really work with are engineering and architecture."

Jenkins said he is not aware of any other Christian college in the United States that works as closely with a four-year university.

"Some others have programs with elementary education, secondary education, and others have associate's degrees. But no one offers a bachelor's degree like we do with K-State," he said.

Wendy Goldsmith, senior in music education and Bible/music ministry, is graduating with a dual degree at the end of this semester. She said she plans on teaching next year and that her experience has prepared her well.

"I got the best of both worlds going to a big university and a small Christian college. MCC prepared me to work in a school environment from a Christian perspective," Goldsmith said.

Virginia Houser, assistant professor of music at K-State, worked with Goldsmith during her time at K-State. She said the program is a good opportunity for some students.

"I think it's a wonderful collaboration. It's not for everyone, but for a student like Wendy to whom the religious aspects of education is really important, they get an added dimension and richness for going to both schools," Houser said.

Students lend K-State spirit to conference

BRENNA TALLEY
Kansas State Collegian

Three of K-State's executive Golden Key National Honor Society members traveled to Wisconsin for three days in early April to the regional conference at the University of Wisconsin at Madison.

Students from clubs in Iowa, Nebraska, Minnesota and other regional schools attended workshops at the conference.

The three K-Staters made themselves known throughout the region for their spirit.

"In previous years, every chapter was supposed to bring a cheer. We were all dressed the same and did this 'firecracker-firecracker' cheer along with the "KSU Wildcats" cheer that Willie does.

"No one else did one, so the next day we got a prize and award for making ourselves known," said Meleah Gearon, junior in advertising and marketing and the K-State chapter's historian.

Golden Key represents the top 15 percent of the junior and senior classes, about 1,000 students, and participates in service-oriented events, such as the annual blood drive and the All-University Open House.

Traci Beckman, junior in accounting and finance and chapter treasurer, said the club's members benefit because there are several corporate sponsors, such as Motorola, NationsBank and General Mills, who will look at a Golden Key members' résumé before they even look at an application from anybody else.

Workshops offered at the conference included small-group speaking skills, investing and how to get into graduate school.

"We find out what the corporate sponsors look for in résumés with one-on-one contact, so later we can call them up and they'll remember who we are," Beckman said.

Since the conference, Golden Key recently had a reception for sophomores who could be potential members.

Richard Harris, junior in microbiology and biochemistry and Golden Key social chair, helped out with the sophomore reception and said he suggests the club for any students who are in the top-15 percent of their class.

"It shows how much hard work you've put in. College isn't easy," Harris said.

Accusations fly during Koch trial testimony

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Bill Koch called his older brother "Prince Charles" during a dispute about the management of Koch Industries, a third Koch brother said Thursday in U.S. District Court.

David Koch also testified that Bill Koch once told a business partner of the company at a private dinner that Koch Industries "screws its partners."

David Koch finished testifying in the trial of a federal lawsuit that pits the multimillionaire Koch brothers against each other. The trial could last another month.

Bill Koch and Frederick Koch, along with other former stockholders, are suing Koch Industries and company executives over a 1983 stock sale. Named as defendants are Charles Koch, the company's chairman and chief executive officer, and David Koch, its executive vice president.

Bill and David Koch are 57-year-old twins. Frederick, 64, never has been active in the company, while Charles, 62, was handpicked by their father to run the business.

More than $1 billion could be at stake. Koch Industries is the nation's second-largest privately owned corporation, with $30 billion in sales in 1997, and interests in crude oil refineries, asphalt plants, cattle ranches, feed lots and grain elevators.

Much of David Koch's testimony has centered on a 1980 stockholders' dispute, which led to Bil Koch's firing as a Koch Industries executive. The former stockholders' attorneys have suggested that dispute led Charles Koch and Koch Industries to cheat the former stockholders in the 1983 stock sale — something the defendants deny.

Attorneys for the former stockholders put David Koch on the stand as a hostile witness.

David Koch said he considered Bill Koch's behavior during the stockholders' dispute irresponsible. He cited both Bill Koch's reference to his older brother as a prince and his dinner comment as inappropriate.

During questioning, Fred Bartlit, a Chicago lawyer who is lead attorney for the former stockholders, suggested company employees generally referred to Charles Koch as "Prince Charles."

David Koch disagreed. "I think Billy coined that term," he said.

The former stockholders contend the price they were paid for their stock in 1983 was too low, and the company deliberately misled them about its value by withholding information. The company contends the former stockholders received a fair price and are waging a legal vendetta.

Attorneys for the former stockholders portray Bill Koch as wanting to reform the management of Koch Industries, to give all stockholders a voice in management. They have portrayed Charles Koch as a dictator.

The defendants' attorneys have portrayed Bill Koch as someone who acted irresponsibly and wanted to take more money out of the company.

As another example of what he considered Bill Koch's inappropriate behavior, David Koch mentioned the private dinner with a potential Koch business partner. David Koch said Bill Koch made the disparaging remark about how the company dealt with potential business partners.

Bartlit asked him if Bill Koch had said Charles Koch usually didn't want partners because he wanted to own everything.

David Koch said he could remember no such statement, only Bill Koch's remark, which shocked him.

Bartlit also questioned David Koch about a July 1980 meeting of the Koch board. At that meeting, Charles Koch wanted to discuss Bill Koch's future in the company — and a possible firing.

Bartlit said Sterling Varner, then Koch's president, was quoted as saying Charles Koch "would run anyone off."

"You must have gotten a really cold feeling in the room," Bartlit said.

David Koch replied, "This was Sterling's way of verbally spanking Billy."

Bartlit then asked David Koch if he saw Varner's remark as no big deal.

"When I got a spanking from father, I thought it was a very big deal," David Koch said.

"But it certainly improved my behavior."

Death of Khmer Rouge leader dashes hopes for prosecution

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ANLONG VENG, Cambodia — Laid out in a simple jungle hut, flowers at his head and the reek of formaldehyde in the air, the body of Khmer Rouge leader Pol Pot was put on display Thursday by his comrades-turned-captors to prove his death to the world.

Pol Pot, 73, died late Wednesday of an apparent heart attack, his captors said, a peaceful end compared with the deaths from violence and starvation of as many as two million Cambodians during the Khmer Rouge's reign.

His death dashed hopes that Pol Pot might finally be brought to justice for crimes against humanity during the 1975-79 Khmer Rouge reign.

Partially covered with a lime-green shroud and dressed in gray slacks and a cotton shirt, Pol Pot's body lay on a wooden bed in a hut less than 300 yards from the border with Thailand. Teen-age guerrillas from the hard-line Khmer Rouge faction that kept Pol Pot under loose house arrest since last year watched silently as photographers snapped pictures and reporters took notes.

A bouquet of flowers rested at his head, and his nose was plugged with cotton balls.

In the distance, fighting could be heard between Khmer Rouge hard-liners on one side, and defectors supported by government troops, who are trying to drive the dwindling band of hard-line holdouts to the border with Thailand.

In Phnom Penh, government spokesman Khieu Kanharith said the government still hopes to catch and try other Khmer Rouge leaders, who lost an important bargaining chip for a peace deal with Pol Pot's death.

The hard-liners, led by Ta Mok, a one-legged general known as "The Butcher," ousted Pol Pot in a bloody power play last year after he opposed peace talks with Cambodia's co-premier at the time, Prince Norodom Ranariddh. The talks collapsed when Ranariddh was deposed in a bloody coup.

> "I THINK WE COULD ALMOST HAVE ARRESTED HIM TOMORROW. IT WAS VERY CLOSE."
> YOUK CHHANG
> director, Documentation Center of Cambodia

Inspired by Chinese communism and schooled in leftist politics in France, Pol Pot, who was born Saloth Sar, orchestrated a communist revolution that turned into one of the most violent reigns of the 20th century.

From 1975-1979, the Khmer Rouge turned Cambodia into a vast killing field and slave labor camp. One Cambodian in five died of overwork, disease and systematic executions before the Khmer Rouge were toppled by an invasion from Vietnam.

Cambodian King Norodom Sihanouk recently described Pol Pot as "one of the most horrible monsters ever created by humanity."

His jailer, Non Nou, said Pol Pot's heart stopped at 11:15 p.m. Wednesday.

"At 12 midnight, (Pol Pot's) wife came to us. She learned that her husband was dead when she was tying the (mosquito) net for him," Non Nou said. "He died in a hut built for him after he lost his power."

The government demanded the body be turned over, but Non Nou said it would be cremated in a day or two.

Pol Pot's death is unlikely to have much affect on Cambodia, preoccupied with a forthcoming election between current strongman Hun Sen and rivals loyal to Ranariddh.

Khmer Rouge leaders recently said they were preparing to hand over Pol Pot but had not decided how or to whom. There were reports Washington D.C. wanted to take him into custody.

"I think we could almost have arrested him tomorrow. It was very close," said Youk Chhang, director of the Documentation Center of Cambodia, a Yale University-affiliated project gathering evidence against Khmer Rouge leaders for any future trials.

Confidential services available to help K-State students in abusive situations

JOSHUA STURGILL
Kansas State Collegian

As students begin to search for summer subleases and housing for the fall semester, it is important to practice caution and to know tenants' rights.

Recently, Jeffrey R. Sullivan, 33, was found guilty of two counts of sexual battery charges brought against him by two female tenants of a property he owned at 922 Bertrand. He will be sentenced next month.

Sullivan faces a maximum possible sentence of two years in jail, said Barry Wilkerson, assistant county attorney.

One of the tenants, who asked not to be identified, said she found the property by answering a classified ad in a local paper.

"I just want this story in the paper so people are cautious when answering ads," she said.

When students find themselves in abusive or potentially abusive situations, or when their rights have been violated, K-State has several offices available to provide help.

Legal advice, crisis management and counseling are among the services available to K-State students. These services are confidential and subsidized by student fees.

Student housing resources in the Office of Student Activities and Services include Consumer and Tenant Affairs and the student's attorney.

Dianne Urban, attorney for legal services for students, said not to worry about money if someone is being abused or threatened. She urges people to get away from the situation as soon as possible.

"Your safety is more important than owing money," she said.

The attorney's office is available to students who are facing abusive situations, but Urban suggests a few simple precautions to avoid housing woes.

These include finding out as much as possible about the living arrangements with other tenants, carefully reading the lease agreement and making sure all tenants sign the same lease and finding out more about tenant rights, including the "Protection from Abuse Act."

Urban also encouraged students to call or come by her office for free consultation.

In addition to the attorney's office, the Women's Center is another campus organization available to help with housing concerns.

This office provides help as a resource and as an advocate for women who need advice, direction or encouragement.

"We're here to help with both problems and potential problems," said Susan Allen, interim director of the Women's Center.

John Robertson, psychologist on staff at University Counseling Services, encourages students that confidentiality is secure and that University Counseling Services is dedicated to giving the best help possible.

"We exist to serve needs like this," he said.

Students who are embarrassed or afraid of their situations and want to seek confidential help can call University Counseling Serivces for an appointment.

"The first five visits are free, and after that the cost is just $10 an hour," Robertson said.

Headliners for 5th Jazz Festival chosen

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Although next year's K-State Jazz Festival is more than nine months away, a New York ensemble, a New York singer and one Kansas Citian have committed to perform.

"Spring Into Jazz," a concert featuring the K-State jazz Lab A and B bands along with the Flute Juice jazz ensemble, will be at 3 p.m. on Sunday in Forum Hall. Admission is free.

Headlining the 1999 festival next February 13 are the Vanguard Jazz Orchestra and singers Carmen Bradford and Kevin Mahogany.

The orchestra, the house band of the famed Village Vanguard jazz club in New York's Greenwich Village, is the former Thad Jones/Mel Lewis big band. Mahogany came to fame in Kansas City, Mo., nightclubs in the 1980s until breaking onto the national scene with his 1993 album "Double Rainbow" and vocal contributions to Robert Altman's "Kansas City" film soundtrack. He has said he still calls Kansas City home. Bradford is a former singer with the Count Basie Orchestra.

This will be the fifth year of the festival and the first time since the original festival where the Basie band will not be among the performers. The 1998 festival featured the Basie band with special guest Jon Faddis.

What is most exciting for Dennis Wilson, director of jazz studies, is the prospect of next year's festival reaching an even larger audience, he said.

"National Public Radio is coming in to do a live broadcast nationwide on their show 'Jazz Set' with Branford Marsalis," Wilson said.

The Saturday festival also will be expanded to two days from the usual one, although this year's festival included one event on the Friday evening before. Wilson said he will be arranging half of the concert's music, as opposed to just arranging the finale. He said next year's festival will continue the big finale, but the Concert Jazz Ensemble will not be a participant, a change from previuos years.

In the meantime, Wilson said he has been organizing three end-of-the-year concerts for K-State jazz bands.

"Spring Into Jazz," featuring the Lab A and B bands with the Flute Juice jazz ensemble, is on Sunday. Coming up May 1 is a free 8 p.m. performance of the Concert Jazz Ensemble in the restored historic Gem Theater at the Kansas City Jazz Museum in the new 18th and Vine District. The final free concert of the year is the Big Band Bash in K-State's Union Station. The bash is from 8 to 11 p.m. on May 8.

Shrine Circus to present 3 performances in Bramlage

ANDREW WIMMER
Kansas State Collegian

Bramlage Coliseum will serve as the big top when the Shrine Circus comes to town Saturday.

After a one-year absence, the circus returns to Manhattan for three shows. Tickets are $3.50 for children and $7.50 for adults in advance and $4 and $8 at the door. Advanced tickets can be purchased at both Dillons locations, Alco and Manhattan Town Center. Show times are 10:30 a.m., 2:30 p.m. and 7:30 p.m.

The circus is sponsored by Isis Shrine Temple in Salina and is an annual fund-raising event for the temple. The Shriners sponsor handicapped and burned children by paying for their medical care.

Marsha Lanoe, who is with the Isis Temple, said they currently are sponsoring 150 children.

"Like any other organization, we cannot survive on our dues alone," she said. "We have to find ways to raise revenue to continue supporting our philanthropy projects."

This is the first time three performances will take place in Manhattan.

"We usually just have one show," Lanoe said. "We thought we might try something different this year. We are planning for a huge turnout."

This is the 46th year the Isis Shrine Temple has brought the Shrine circus to north central Kansas. This year's theme is "Circus Hollywood."

"We went through the brochures and looked at different troupes and what they were doing," Lanoe said. "We thought 'Circus Hollywood' was a neat idea, and people would really enjoy it."

Lanoe said the Shriners have been looking forward to the circus and coming back to Manhattan.

"We do a show in Hays and Salina, but the turnout in Manhattan is always the best."

CIRQUE ELOIZE, THE 16-MAN CANADIAN CIRCUS WILL BE SHOWING SUNDAY AT MCCAIN AUDITORIUM.

Canadian circus to perform in McCain

CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

All the thrills of the big top are coming this weekend to McCain Auditorium.

Cirque Eloize, a Canadian performance group that has toured everywhere from Vancouver to St. Louis, will bring its modern circus, "Excentricus," on Sunday to McCain. The show will include acrobatics, precision balancing, juggling, dancers, live music, body contortionists, clowns and aerialists.

Cirque Eloize began 12 years ago with only five members. Since then, the group has added 11 individuals to its lineup. Most are former members of the Cirque du Soleil and Montreal's Ecole National de Cirque.

Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium, said the group is sure to entertain all audience members.

"It will appeal to the child, but it also has values that will entertain both the discriminating child and his parents," he said. "This is a pleasant, entertaining, new-age circus. It certainly isn't traditional."

▶ Circus info
For more information about the circus, call the McCain Auditorium Box Office at 532-6428.

Because there are no animal acts in Cirque Eloize, audiences might be disappointed, Martin said. But what they will see, he said, will be breathtaking.

"This is not a Ringling Brothers, Barnum and Bailey circus," Martin said. "It's a different approach. For instance, the role of the lighting and the role of the music is quite different from the type of circus the audience may remember from their childhood."

With the circus coming to town, Martin said, the McCain house crew needed to get ready ahead of time for its arrival. This meant preparing whatever Cirque Eloize needed for its acrobats and aerialists. Both crews from McCain and Cirque Eloize already have discussed any foreseeable problems.

"It's our job to rig whatever they need for the show," Martin said. "The crew has gained quite a bit of experience, so we'll be able to cope with whatever is thrown our way."

Martin said Cirque Eloize's "Excentricus" will be like nothing the audience will ever see at the circus, and the group adds an artistic touch to its performances.

"This is a fully produced show that has its own artistic point of view," he said.

"This is an attraction that is worth the audience's time and money."

"THIS IS AN ATTRACTION THAT IS WORTH THE AUDIENCE'S TIME AND MONEY."
RICHARD MARTIN, MCCAIN AUDITORIUM DIRECTOR

Seemingly unoriginal band surprises pop-rock listeners with its latest EP

JOHN FRANSON

Music Review

Julia Surrenderd
"Sweet Little Superstar"

4 stars
Keeps ya hummin'

"Frantic pop-rock swarming with irresistible hooks and utter conviction," reads the press kit for Lawrence band Julia Surrendered's latest EP, "Sweet Little Superstar."

When I saw that, contempt began to creep in. Why must bands still dance with the corpse of power-pop? I read the sentence to nearby Collegian staffers. "Sounds like some pretty original stuff," I said, my voice oozing sarcasm, while others predicted the album to be "poop."

But let's be fair: How many "original" new bands are there? How much can a band do that hasn't been done before?

At no time while listening to this album did I spring from my chair and exclaim, "Wow! I've never heard anything like it." But after only a couple listens, I found myself humming the tunes involuntarily, and I had to concede that the songs were actually not bad. In fact, they were better than some of the stuff peddled from the commercial "alternative" radio stations.

"Sweet Little Superstar" hits the ground running with "Bangor," a head-bobbing number with passionate vocals. It is evident right away that this is not the work of beginners, though the song briefly lurches into hardcore near the middle, which the band executes less convincingly. Sweet background vocal harmonies punctuate the song, and they recur throughout the album.

The middle song, "Fame Thing," is the least memorable of the trio. It sounds like "Bangor," but with less catchy melodies. It does have a nice harmonica solo, though.

The last song, "See My Savior," is the most interesting of the bunch. More contemplative than the other songs, it switches between acoustic and electric guitar, in places sounding a bit like Creed (for better or for worse). The skittering vocal stylings add much to the song.

The album was recorded at Chapman Studios by Ken Paulakovich, who worked on Offspring's smash "Smash," so the sound is clear, not muddy like some local releases.

Judging by the band's thick press kit, the members aim for nothing less than stardom. Fortunately, it's not all hype. The songs on "Sweet Little Superstar" display skills and ambition that could take the band far.

Julia Surrendered might dance with the corpse of power-pop, but the band does know some pretty good moves.

Gala to raise money to move department to Nichols

AMY MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

Most students don't have to worry about their classes being canceled due to cold weather, and most don't risk banging their heads on classroom ceilings every day.

However, these have been real concerns for the Department of Speech Communication, Theater and Dance. The department is preparing for a gala fund-raiser Sunday at the Folly Theater in Kansas City, Mo., to raise part of the $150,000 needed from donors to rebuild studios and move the dance program to Nichols Hall.

The event will be a dance performance featuring K-State students and members of the State Ballet of Missouri.

David Procter, associate professor and head of the department, said the dance program is moving mainly because the old studios in Ahearn Field House have so many problems. The ceilings are too low, which has resulted in dancers bumping their heads when being lifted by other dancers. And the old studios aren't weatherproof anymore, so the wind blows right through the windows, he said.

"Every winter without fail, we lose days because our dancers can't get warm enough for their muscles to loosen up," he said. "We don't want to injure them, and we don't want to injure faculty, so we have to cancel class."

Show info
Tickets to the gala are $10 for the dance and $50 and up for brunch and the performance.

Groundbreaking is scheduled to begin in May on four state-of-the-art studios and three offices in Nichols. The studios will have higher ceilings and sprung hardwood floors that give upon impact, similar to floors used for professional basketball courts or aerobics studios, Procter said. Three of the studios' floors will have a vinyl covering to make them multipurpose for either dance or theater classes. The fourth studio, named for modern dance choreographer Luke Kahlich, will be a "barefoot" studio with no floor covering.

Joyce Yagerline, assistant professor and dance instructor, said the advantages of newer, more up-to-date studios are manifold. The studios being in the same building as the rest of the department will eliminate the physical barrier now present, and two will be larger studios to allow for bigger classes and a sense of "airiness."

"There's a psychological advantage to a bigger room," she said. "In a small room, you tend to dance 'small.'"

Procter said the department will retain one of the Ahearn studios. The increase in studio space has become necessary as dance majors have tripled in the last five years and as the dancers have widened their interests in types of dance classes. They are taking the traditional classes like ballet, jazz and modern dance, but also enrolling in tap, ballroom dance and aikido, which is a martial art but still a fundamental study in movement, he said.

"We've had not only an increase in our dance majors," he said, "but also desire for what I would call additional dance experience. There's a high demand on studio space, so by retaining one studio, it helps the congestion."

One of the mutipurpose studios, designated primarily for theater classes to learn correct types of body movement, will be named the Ruth Ann Wefald "Movement" Studio, in honor of Wefald's tireless support of both theater and dance, he said.

"She has been helping raise funds for the renovation project downstairs and very active with our theater program," he said, "so we thought it was appropriate to name one of the studios after her."

> "IT'S VERY SATISFYING BECAUSE I GET TO SHARE MY WORK WITH PEOPLE, AND IT SEEMS LIKE ALL THE TIME SPENT ON IT AND THE DEDICATION WAS WORTH IT."
> DIANA YAMABAYSHI
> senior in theater

Wefald chairs the development committee for the gala Sunday. She said actually two committees of about 20 people each were formed, one in Manhattan and one in Kansas City, because the purpose of this fund-raiser was to reach K-State alumni in the Kansas City area who would be interested in supporting the arts.

"That was our goal," she said, "to sort of tap into the Kansas City market because the audience that you're sometimes reaching, in terms of who loves the dance well enough to give significant donations to it, is somewhat limited in a small community like this, so putting on a gala event here would be more challenging than in a metropolitan area."

Yagerline said about 30-35 dancers will perform Sunday. Five of the dances will be performed by K-State students, and most of those pieces were performed in SpringDance '98. Two dancers from the Missouri ballet will give a sneak preview of the pas de deux from "A Midsummer's Night's Dream," which the company will perform in its entirety next week. And one piece, choreographed by Yagerline, features two female K-State dancers and one male Missouri dancer.

"It's a wonderful opportunity to do collaborative work with the state ballet," she said.

Two of the K-State dances for the the fund raiser were choreographed by students. Diana Yamabayashi, senior in theater, said she has enjoyed the opportunity to share her dance, a modern piece titled "Alegria," with others.

"It's very satisfying because I get to share my work with people," she said, "and it seems like all the time spent on it and the dedication was worth it."

Dena Fox, senior in dance therapy and gerontology, said her piece, "23 Down to 9," was originally a Classy Cats routine and then part of SpringDance '98. Originally she was hesitant to audition the dance because usually the department exhibits more ballet and modern pieces.

"This is more of a Classy Cats, have fun, no-holds-barred dance," she said. "But it's probably something the students will relate to more."

The dance was originally choreographed for 23 people, then cut down to 15 for SpringDance. When only nine people showed up to audition the dance for SpringDance, Fox named the piece "23 Down to 9."

dance, offer educational information and have fun.

"This illustrates our commitment to teaching people about how to protect our environment," Fenstermacher said.

This is the Sunset Zoo's fifth year as host of the Earth Day celebration. Fenstermacher said the zoo added the family service organizations to the environmental theme last year to increase the information available.

"People were looking for new information," Fenstermacher said. "This was a way to sneak in more education."

The zoo is expecting to have between 1,000 and 2,000 people attend. Fenstermacher said most will be high school and college-age students who are interested in environmental issues as well as grade-school children.

Fenstermacher said the zoo sees this event as an opportunity to educate the regular zoo crowd about environmental issues.

People attending must pay regular zoo admission.

The activities will be from 10 a.m. to 5:30 p.m.

who Love is or hasn't heard his name," Getz said.

"But a lot of people do not know what a nice guy he was."

Carrie Bettles, who has danced at Dr. Love's for six years, said he was outgoing and always joking around.

"He was not real strict. He would give us subtle hints when we were doing something wrong," Bettles said.

Bettles said because of her tenure, Love was like a father to her.

Jamee Smith, another dancer at Dr. Love's, said she also regards Love with great esteem. She said she agrees with Bettles' image of Love as a fatherly figure.

"He was like a father for all of us. We love him, we'll miss him and we will always think of him," Smith said.

His body can be viewed from 3 to 5 p.m. Sunday at Edwards-Yorgensen-Meloan Funeral Home. Love's funeral is scheduled for 2 p.m. Monday at Morris Hill in Fort Riley.

Dr. Love's will be closed until next week.

Music professor pays tribute to Holocaust victims

DIANA LEE
Kansas State Collegian

Holocaust Remembrance Day on Thursday commemorates a dark time in 20th-century history.

In conjunction with the day honoring the survivors and victims of the horrors of Nazi Germany, Claudia Stevens will present "An Evening With Madame F," at 8 tonight in Forum Hall.

Stevens is a professor of music at the College of William and Mary in Williamsburg, Va. She was commissioned by the Richmond Jewish Federation in Richmond, Va., to create a work that honors the musicians who were forced to perform music in the horrific conditions of the Nazi concentration camps.

"There was an actual person named Fania Fenelon, who is the Madame F of this presentation. She was a musician and singer who was in the concentration camp at Auschwitz-Birkenau," said Deborah Fedder, a staff worker with B'nai B'rith Hillel, the campus Jewish student organization.

Fedder said Nazis found out which prisoners within the camp were musicians and formed them into a small orchestra. Their lives were spared longer than some others, but they still experienced the unreal pressures of existence and the precarious balance between life and death within the camp.

"The threat of being killed always loomed over them. Their lives could have been taken at any time if their music didn't suit the fancy of the Nazis," Fedder said.

More info?
"An Evening With Madame F," presented by Claudia Stevens is at 8 tonight at Forum Hall. Admission is free.

The orchestra members were forced to perform music for the Nazi hierarchy and also at many horrible moments in the camp.

"They had to play during the countdown when prisoners were forced to stand in lines for hours while the guards checked to make sure no one had escaped, for one example," Fedder said.

After Fenelon's liberation from Birkenau, she wrote a memoir of her experience, titled "Playing for Time." Arthur Miller wrote the screen play for a film of the same title, in which Vanessa Redgrave portrayed Fenelon in her experiences at Birkenau.

"Stevens read these works and created a dramatic interpretation. Fred Cohen, also a professor of music, created music for it. His music included classical works that Fania might have played along with his own original compositions," Fedder said.

The work delves into the strange situation that developed for the musicians, caught in the trap of creating beautiful music in an inhumane setting. Stevens examines the ethical dilemma of these inmates who produced music to survive.

"The presentation examines the issues and problems at work in the situation, such as should they have played the music to spare their lives or not," Fedder said.

"Stevens' parents were Holocaust survivors and didn't tell her until she was an adult. In fact, they also concealed the fact that they were Jewish from her."

Fedder said remembrance of the Holocaust is important to observe because it is not necessarily an isolated incident and is an influential portion of our recent past.

"It happened in our time, in a place that was considered very cultured and civilized. These same things could be happening today. It could happen again," Fedder said.

She said the most important lesson is one of taking individual action.

"It should make us humble and help us realize the world is not finished with these types of actions. All of us who want to be respectable, decent people need to take notice," Fedder said.

A FIREFIGHTER SPRAYS WATER ON A STRUCTURE FIRE IN A THIRD-FLOOR APARTMENT AT CHASE MANHATTAN APARTMENTS EARLY SUNDAY MORNING. THE ONLY INJURY REPORTED WAS A FIREFIGHTER'S ANKLE INJURY.

Questions remain in fire at Chase Manhattan Apartments

RICHARD DIEPENBROCK AND JOHN HENDERSON
Kansas State Collegian

Early Sunday morning, a third-story apartment in the Chase Manhattan Apartments complex caught fire, causing damage to the north end of one building.

The fire caused $82,725 of damage to items inside 13 apartments in the building, and four apartments sustained $133,000 worth of structural damage, said Jerry Snyder, Manhattan Fire Department battalion chief. A firefighter sustained an ankle injury, but no residents were harmed.

Snyder said the fire began on the balcony of Apt. 19 and spread inside.

"The main fire damage was to that apartment 19, and to the roof structure," he said.

"The apartments directly below 19 had water damage."

The occupants of Apt. 19, sisters Karla and Kristi Shue, seniors in elementary education, said they were asleep at 4:14 a.m. Sunday when the alarm sounded.

Karla Shue said she thought the alarm was a prank, before she and her sister went to the living room and saw their balcony on fire.

"We were leaving just as the windows started shattering," she said.

Scott Mann, freshman in horticulture and resident of Delta Upsilon, said he had just returned from Kansas City, Mo., when he and his fraternity brothers saw the blaze.

"It had just started and was climbing up the wall," Mann said.

The three ran to the complex and started banging on doors, Mann said. Brent Korte, junior in biology, said he and Nathan Schwab, freshman in wildlife biology, pulled the fire alarms at the same time.

The electricity was turned off for the building, which cut off power for several other buildings. Shannon Glaser, property manager for Chase Manhattan, said half of the apartments in 1410 Watson Place had power by Sunday evening.

Glaser said the displaced tenants would be moved to other apartments in the complex.

"Our insurance covers the building," Glaser said.

"And everybody's personal insurance covers personal damage."

Kristi Shue said everything in her apartment had smoke or fire damage.

Karla Shue said she considers herself and her sister lucky.

"The firemen said third-floor fires have high casualties," she said.

Snyder said the cause of the fire was undetermined. Glaser said she was told Chase Manhattan also was not at fault.

Karla Shue said she wonders what could have caused the fire.

"It had to be human, but we were asleep," she said.

"Something had to set our balcony on fire."

Hazing suspected in injury

A K-State student remains in serious condition after what the Riley County Police Department described as a possible hazing Saturday night.

Ernest L. Harris Jr., senior in marketing and international business, was transported to the KU Medical Center after sustaining back injuries.

Riley County officers were sent to the emergency room at Mercy Health Center on College Avenue to investigate. Harris' condition was listed as serious Sunday afternoon.

Harris' father, Ernest Harris Sr., said the injuries to his son were quite extensive.

"He has severe damage to his back and to his kidneys," Harris Sr. said.

Riley County Police have not yet released any information as to how the injuries were caused, but Harris Sr. said his son was beaten severely with a paddle.

Harris Sr. also said he is sure the beating was some sort of hazing incident.

"I've been told that the ones who took part in the beating were not regular members. They were some sort of renegade members," he said.

Harris Sr. said the beating took place at the home of a member of the Kappa Alpha Psi fraternity — his son's fraternity. Police investigations could not confirm this.

The president of Kappa Alpha Psi could not be reached for comment.

The RCPD is continuing its investigation, and no arrests have been made.

Falsified IDs ease ability to get liquor

BARBARA HOLLINGSWORTH

Editor's Note: This story is the first in a weeklong series about alcohol use and abuse by K-State students.

For underage students equipped with a fake ID or a 21-year-old friend, alcohol is not out of reach.

Students who drink, and those who don't, agree that drinking before one's 21st birthday is not a challenge.

"Anyone can get it," Jason Hendrix, 21 and junior in architectural engineering, said. "My sister's only 18, and she can get it."

Even police officers agree that finding alcohol is not a challenge for underage students.

"To purchase, it would kind of depend on what store and where they're at," said Sgt. Stanley Conkwright of the Riley County Police Department. "To go

Benefit auction raises funds for Regional AIDS Project

JOE HURLA
Kansas State Collegian

Organizers of the Regional AIDS Project Spring Fling got a crash course in economics Saturday night.

They learned the hard way that if there is no demand for a product, the price levels drop, even if that product happens to be a potential date for the evening.

"We just didn't have enough people show up to bid," explained Kathy Battles, coordinator of the bachelor and bachelorette auction. "We didn't advertise well enough, and that really hurt us."

Battles said the lack of advertising was the main reason the event didn't raise as much money as she estimated it would.

"We had hoped to raise about $2,000. We think we're going to finish the evening with about $500," Battles said.

Despite raising only a portion of what she had hoped to raise, Battles said the event should be called anything but a failure.

"We didn't make as much money as we'd wanted, but that's OK. We did succeed in letting people know that RAP is here, and we're available to help," Battles said.

Eunice Dorst, executive director of RAP, said she agreed with Battles' assessment of the evening's events.

"It's the first one we've done, and we've learned a lot from it. We also have started to get our message out, and that's what we want to continue doing," Dorst said.

Dorst said she felt RAP's message is especially important because there are so many misconceptions about AIDS.

"People who think that AIDS itself is the problem are wrong," Dorst said. "It's people with HIV that are the problem. You can be HIV-positive for 10 to 15 years with no symptoms.

"It's estimated that one in 250 people are infected with HIV," she said. "Many people don't realize that it's

Relatives of victims gather to remember those lost on OKC bombing anniversary

OKLAHOMA CITY — Survivors, relatives of victims and others gathered Sunday with flowers and hymns for the third anniversary of the federal building bombing that killed 168 people. Some carried small bells that they rang after 168 seconds of silence.

As the names of the dead were read, families moved onto the green grass where the piles of rubble had once been and placed wreaths to remember the victims.

Country singer Randy Travis sang "I Did My Part" and "Amazing Grace."

Actor Gerald McRaney told the relatives the bombers failed in their goal of damaging the morale of the American people.

"The people of Oklahoma demonstrated to the world what the United States stands for," said McRaney, a star of CBS-TV's "Promised Land," which is filming in Oklahoma City. "People of every color, ethnicity and religion displayed compassion, sacrifice, courage and love not for notoriety or credit but simply because it needed doing.

"We can never know the terror that you felt," McRaney said. "We can never know the pain of your loss, the depths of your despair or the heights of your courage. What we can do, what we will do, is to be inspired by you.

"We can say to that enemy who always underestimates the resolve of ordinary Americans, we will meet your cowardice with courage ... we will resist your terror with faith, we will defeat your hatred with love and we will see justice done."

Waco standoff survivors announce plans for museum honoring memories of dead

WACO, Texas — Sheila Martin said she thought there should be more to commemorate the deadly Waco standoff than the burned rubble of the Branch Davidian compound.

Martin, who lost her husband, a son and three daughters in the inferno that ended the 51-day standoff, said she hopes a museum slated to open Sunday — the fifth anniversary of the fire — will help her deal with the loss.

"For so many days, I was looking at the building, or looking at the building on fire, but I don't see any of the faces," she said. "When I remembered when I was in there, I remembered what it was like ... I remembered those faces."

Martin, who escaped the compound before the fire, said she wants more people to see those she remembers.

"There are so many things that people haven't seen and understood," she said. "This way, they can have faces."

Nearly 80 people died when the fire erupted as federal authorities moved on the compound April 19, 1993, in an attempt to arrest Branch Davidian leader David Koresh on weapons charges.

Each of those who died in the fire will be remembered in the museum by a plaque and a tree planted at the Mount Carmel site. A memorial will take place Sunday.

"A lot of people come out, and there's not much to see out here," Davidian Clive Doyle said.

Doyle said he began work last month on the wood-framed museum with the help of a handful of volunteers.

"The (Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms) and the FBI didn't leave much behind," he said. "We hope through the pictures and whatever else we put in there that they will have something to enjoy."

Those who visit the museum will be able to glance at photographs, a timeline of the standoff and historical memorabilia, including books and videotapes of speeches from Davidian leaders. A model of the Davidians' compound before the fire also will be part of the exhibit.

"We've had a lot of people out here — I guess what you would call — squatting, talking about what was supposed to have happened and what didn't happen, and most of it was misinformation," Doyle said. "This will give people something worth looking at, something more informative."

Zoo sponsors Earth Day celebration

JAMI BOYLES
Kansas State Collegian

Parents hurried behind their children at Sunset Zoological Park on Saturday as they ran from booth to booth exploring displays set up by local environmental organizations.

About 15 area organizations set up booths with an environmental theme in celebration of Earth Day.

The booths offered a wide variety of fun and educational activities for children.

Children waited in line to meet Smokey Bear and Fire Pup at the Manhattan Fire Department booth. Sunset Zoo docents offered free face painting. Fire trucks and ambulances were also on display.

Wal-Mart Green Team set up tables equipped with markers, crayons and colored pencils for children to make Earth Day cards. Children drew pictures of recycling bins, rainbows, trees and anything with an environmental theme.

Wal-Mart Green Team helps to fund environmental projects and organizations. It also promotes environmental awareness.

Green Team Coordinator Susan Rush said Wal-Mart does activities like this to help educate people and stress the importance of the environment.

"Wal-Mart is big on trying to do things to help out with the environment," Rush said. "We wanted to do an activity to help people be more conscious of the environment. This is something to help people think about it."

Riley County-Manhattan Health Department handed out information about water supplies, composting and recycling at its booth.

Environmental health supervisor Judy Willingham said the booth will help raise awareness about this aspect of the health department.

"We want to encourage people to know that we're here so they can call," Willingham said. "We're always very glad to answer questions."

Enviroleague had a large display board and, a raffle for a bird feeder at its booth. This organization tries to get families involved with the environment through several local projects such as the Pillsbury Crossing cleanup.

Mary Thornton, Enviroleague member, said she hoped the booth would increase awareness about the program and encourage membership. She said her family got involved because it was a lot of fun, and it was a way for her son to spend more time with his friends.

This is the fifth year Sunset Zoo has sponsored the event. It is host to the event to increase zoo attendance and to promote awareness about the environment, Angie Fenstermacher, zoo spokeswoman, said.

"We always like to have these events," she said. "It's an opportunity for us to get people out here more than one or two times a year."

Students can get involved during service week

ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

Volunteers will be participating in projects around Manhattan this week in recognition of the 10th anniversary of Community Service Week.

Jim Theres, public relations director for the Community Service Program, said there are many ways students can get involved.

Theres said K-State already has good community service involvement, and this week is a great opportunity for volunteers to be recognized, with a project each day.

"My own perspective is that there is a heck of a lot of community service on campus through sororities, fraternities, Golden Key, Blue Key and other organizations," Theres said.

"This is done throughout the year, and no one keeps track of it all," he said. "This is a good opportunity for folks to come out and be recognized under one umbrella of community service."

Theres said there will be a small recognition ceremony at Sunset Zoological Park on Friday from 3 to 4 p.m., with refreshments for anyone who volunteered during the week.

"It's just to recognize volunteers and to interact with groups, organizations and people who participated throughout the week," Theres said.

Emily Willis, who works in the Community Service Program office, said she is looking forward to the week.

"I think they have a lot of good projects scheduled," she said. "And it will provide a lot of opportunities for K-State students to get involved in community service if they haven't before or even if they have."

Willis said the Community Service Program is expecting a lot of people to volunteer, including athletic teams.

K-State's volleyball team will be at Meadowlark Hills Retirement Center to volunteer on Monday, and the women's basketball team will be at the Manhattan Emergency Shelter on Thursday from 5 to 6 p.m.

Community Service Week's Schedule:

Today
St. Joseph Retirement Center, 2 to 5 p.m.
Meadowlark Hills Retirement Center, 3 to 5 p.m.

Tuesday

Summer gives students charitable opportunities

Instead of throwing away important household items while packing to leave Manhattan after graduation or for a summer job, think about donating food, clothing and furniture to charitable agencies in the community.

Sorting and prioritizing personal belongings are important aspects of any moving process. The items that don't make the cut might be helpful to others.

Garage sales are always an option, but so is donating furniture and household items to thrift stores, flea markets and charity organizations. Although students usually can turn a small profit by selling unwanted household appliances and furniture, these items also can be donated to help struggling students or families and can be donated at the following places:

DAV Thrift Store, 322 Houston St., 537-9771.

City Farmers Flea Market & Surplus Store, 201 S. Fourth St., 539-8579.

Salvation Army, 117 W. Seventh St., Junction City, 238-7875.

Grandma's Trunk Thrift Shop, 1304 Pillsbury Drive, 537-2273.

Salvation Army, 411 Poyntz Ave., Suite 6, 539-9399.

Instead of discarding unwanted food and clothing, consider donating these items to assist agencies in the Manhattan community, such as the Flint Hills Breadbasket, 905 Yuma St., 537-0730, and the Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc., 831 Leavenworth St., 537-3113.

Boxes of dried foods, such as macaroni, and canned goods are helpful donations to families in need. Second-hand clothing also will be accepted at some area agencies. Call to find out which items are needed before throwing a good coat or shoes into the trash.

Stockpiling aluminum cans, newspapers, magazines, glass and plastic containers during a semester can accumulate rather quickly. Devoting a little extra time to recycle these items in the community not only helps save the environment but usually can add some cash to your pockets.

Area recycling centers include Howie's Recycling, 625 S. 10th St., 776-8352, and Cash Back Recycling, Clay Center, 1-800-974-5233.

When packing to move, look at ways to utilize other containers instead of relying completely on discarded boxes. Take advantage of old Collegian editions to pack between breakable items.

Be thrifty and use items effectively during the move.

ENROLLMENT HELL

K-State student deals with trials, tribulations of enrollment in Willard Hall

VIEWPOINT

LISA DETHLOFF

Lisa is a graduate student in public administration. You can send e-mail to Lisa at batman@ksu.edu.

Since April 8, students at K-State have been going through the ultimate experience. And I do not mean watching a football game and surviving the evening in Aggieville afterward.

The experience I am talking about is called the enrollment process, and the emotions students go through depend on their academic situation. For example, seniors graduating in December might be overjoyed to see the last semester schedule for their undergraduate degrees. Or, freshmen, who are nervous enough about taking college-level classes, finally get appointments with their advisers.

Freshmen design their class schedules mostly with general education classes, prays every day classes will not be closed, and then on the day of enrollment find two options. The first option is taking 7:30 a.m. and 3:30 p.m. classes five days a week. The second option is to enroll in some off-the-wall classes that are supposed to count as "electives." If lucky, the general education classes will be completed by their senior year when there are openings in the expository writing program.

From my experience, take option No. 1 because you might do what I did. I changed my major three times only to have the "electives" of one major not count for anything in the other major. Remember, the goal is to finish the undergrad within a decade.

This leads me to a story about a friend of mine who had one of the most agonizing experiences with the enrollment process. The story is so horrific it has to be told. I hope a K-State student never will have to go through an ordeal like this again.

I call my story "Robin: The Cursed K-Stater at Enrollment Time." This student has had so much trouble with enrollment that the workers at Enrollment Services hug her when she finally has a class schedule.

Robin is a junior majoring in family studies and community service and minoring in leadership studies and political science.

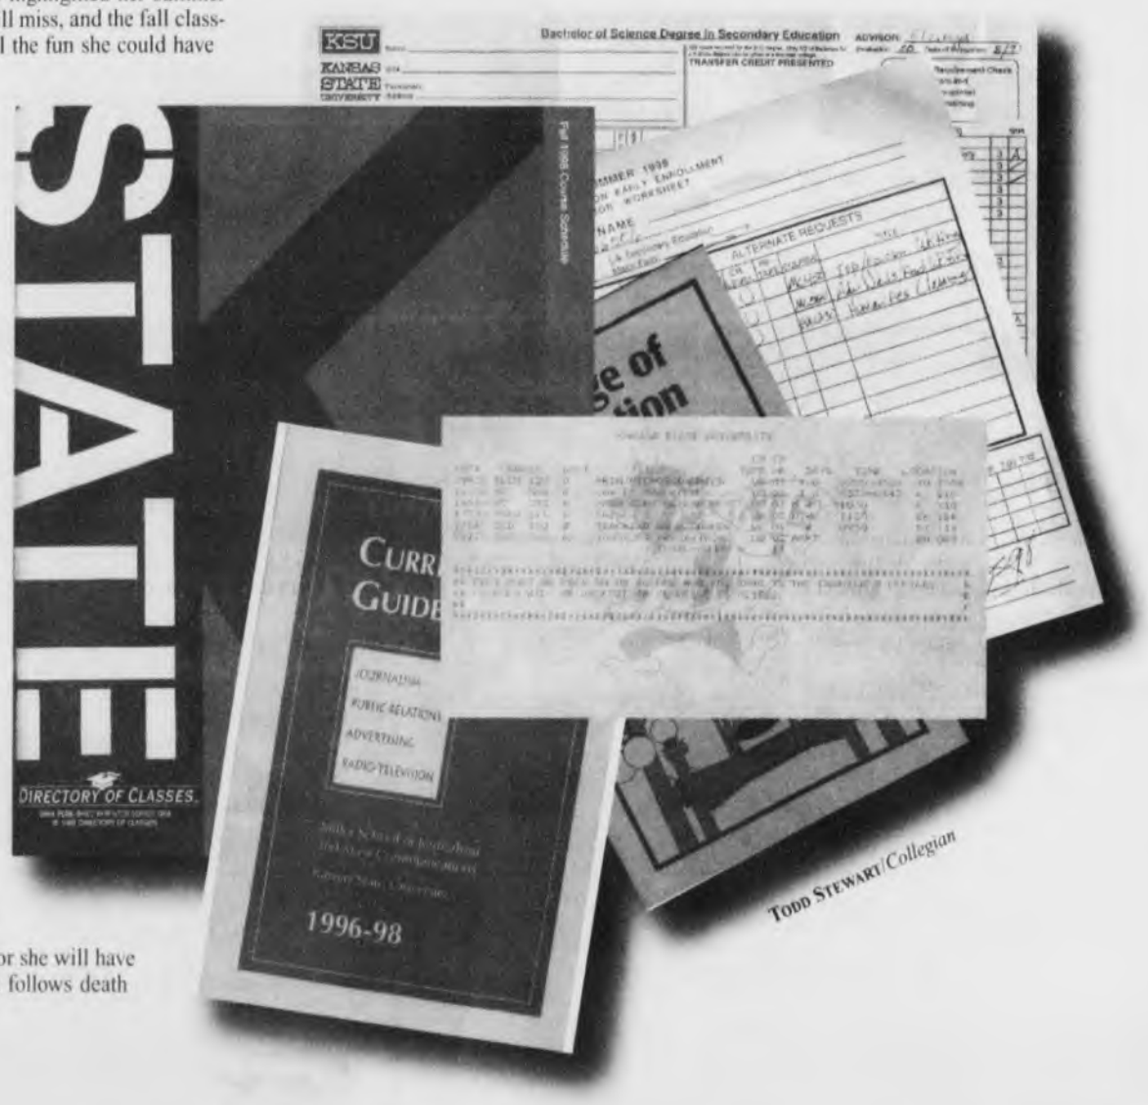
All Robin wants to do at K-State is get her three degrees before she is so old she cannot distinguish up from down or K-State from the University of Kansas.

However, she seemed to have the enrollment gods upset with her ,because this semester she just couldn't seem to get classes she needed. With three degrees, you would think the classes would be begging her to take them. The hits just kept on coming.

Hit No. 1 — She changed her major this semester, so the graduation date has been delayed. Plus, she will spend her summer vacation in summer school instead of having fun in the sun.

Hit No. 2 — The preparation phase. Robin listed all the classes she must take to graduate. For current classes, she highlighted her summer school classes in yellow for all of the sun she will miss, and the fall classes are highlighted in purple to remind her of all the fun she could have had at the football games had she not been studying so much.

Hit No. 3 — Robin scheduled an appointment with her adviser to make sure everything is correct and to get that gateway to enrollment, the purple sheet. However, the day of the appointment, her adviser had to attend a funeral, and the appointment was rescheduled. Enrollment is delayed, and Robin could just see her classes closing one by one.



Hit No. 4 — Robin met with her adviser. They made some changes to the schedule, and then Robin was off to Willard Hall for the first of her many trips. Originally, she wanted 18 hours, but only nine of those hours were open. So being the resourceful person she is, she was just going to pull out the classes she needed for her leadership minor, and her problems would be solved. Wrong. The list was at home.

Hit No. 5 — Robin returned to Willard for the second time. She was thinking positive thoughts knowing this would be the time she would enroll. Wrong. The only leadership classes available then were all at night, which was just not an option. So Robin walked back home, because as cursed as she was, the list for the political science classes was not with her.

The last time I saw Robin, she was talking to her fall line schedule, pleading with it to let her have any type of class schedule that applies to either her major or two minors.

I pray that everything turns out for the best, or she will have to resort to her very last option, the option that follows death — engineering classes.

Oprah should use her influence, pull to help women set priorities straight

VIEWPOINT

SHELLY SLATIER

Shelly is a senior in pre-journalism and mass communications. You can send your e-mail to Shelly at sas4296@ksu.edu.

I will be the first to admit that when scheduling my classes I make sure to leave 4 p.m. open, because I don't want to miss "The Oprah Winfrey Show."

Winfrey has gone from Chicago reporter to national talk-show host because she is good at getting a story and relating it to an audience. I admire her talent and her prestige.

But I don't think she knows just how much she influences people. (For goodness sake, some people stopped eating beef because of her.) Anyhow, my point is, how does Oprah influence the millions of women who watch her show every day?

We've seen her through the years battling with her weight, and for now, she has been able to control it successfully. In doing so, and flaunting it on national television, what kinds of messages, intentional or not, has she been sending to her audience?

She wrote a book on how she lost weight. It encourages women to keep a journal of what they eat and how much they exercise. By keeping this journal, she is sending women the message that being smaller and in shape puts them in control of their lives.

If this is an aspect of being in control of life, what little time we have to do something with it, then how many hours a day does she encourage women to waste away sweating in a heath club?

Weight and size are determined genetically, and I don't have a problem with maintaining it. But, no matter how hard people try they will not wake up one morning and weigh a buck-o-five. Just like no matter how hard people try, they will never wake up with blue eyes if they are born with brown ones.

Oprah has so much influence on society, she should be sending women the message that they should be bigger, be louder and be stronger. She should be encouraging women to take the focus of their life off the weight scale and to concentrate on politics.

I know that's confusing, but in the United States, what is the the best title a man can achieve? U.S. president. What is the best title a woman can achieve? Miss America. Society has us believing men are valued for their achievements and women valued only through their looks.

If Oprah were to encourage society to shift its priorities and expectations, I believe we would see results.

I am tired of women being passive, fragile and irritable because they don't eat real food. I am tired of seeing women slave away at aerobics classes just to fit into the same pair of jeans they wore when they were in high school.

I want to encourage women, and Oprah, to be satisfied with their bodies. I want women to realize that life is too short to be exhausted and starving all the time. I want society to understand that diversity in shapes and sizes is what makes the world go round.

I am tired of hearing women complain about how fat they are and tired of hearing about all of the newest diets they have tried and failed.

I want women to look in the mirror, take a long look and realize there is more to see than flesh. What about your beautiful attitude, your courageous voice or your creative mind?

Yeah, I'm still going to flop on the couch with a bag of butter popcorn and a Coke and tune into the Oprah show. But, I'm not going to jot down how many carrot sticks I ate and how many miles I walked to and from campus, because I have better things to do with my time.

Season-ticket policy necessary to remain competitive in football

Editor,

I am the father of a K-State graduate student in business administration and an incoming freshman. My wife and I have been football season ticket holders for four years running. Big deal, right?

We went to the Cotton Bowl, but passed on Tucson opting for a kitchen remodel instead. Our cars sport Powercat plates, our house a Powercat flag and my favorite jacket a Powercat logo.

We probably are qualified as bandwagon fans using your editorial rationale. And on top of that, we live in Johnson County — God forbid.

We support the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics' move toward upgrading K-State's program. We doubled our Mike Ahearn Scholarship Fund donation this year, but hope we keep the same end zone seats. We have this sense about a correlation between money and quality in athletic programs.

And yes, we have a corporate mentality. Ah, free enterprise — so ravenous to our nation. We even believe there is a place for a business attitude in some aspects of an academic institution.

Folks, the athletic department is playing with the big boys now — Florida State University, the University of Southern California, the University of Texas and that group.

It takes money. If we want the trend to continue, we best stop whining and realize there is a price to pay for success. As long as the department rightly recognizes seniority in the ticket selection process, it should feel comfortable competing reasonably for the entertainment dollars of its fans. It's that, or kiss Bill Snyder and his lightning bolts goodbye. Should that happen, do you suppose he could find an extra buck or two in Lawrence?

HABITAT FOR HUMANITY

MEMBERS OF PI BETA PHI SORORITY HELP THE LINNIE AND PAMELA HAMILTON FAMILY WITH THE GROUNDBREAKING CEREMONY OF THE NEW HABITAT FOR HUMANITY HOME SUNDAY AFTERNOON. THE PI PHIS RAISED MONEY FOR THE HOME THAT THE HAMILTON FAMILY WILL MOVE INTO AFTER COMPLETION.

Ground broken for Oprah house

For Linnie and Pamela Hamilton, it's almost as though angels have provided their first home.

On Sunday afternoon, Habitat for Humanity broke ground for the Hamilton's home, one of 205 houses being built as part of the Oprah Angel Network. Oprah Winfrey challenged viewers to build with Habitat last fall, and Pi Beta Phi sorority members took on the challenge. They plan to raise more than $35,000 for the house.

The Pi Phi's involvement is one of the main reasons Manhattan will have an Oprah house, Marcia Schuley, Manhattan's Habitat president, said.

More info?
The Pi Phis will have a miniature golf tournament Saturday at Wildcat Creek Sport's Center. People interested in competing can call 539-PLAY.

"Lindsey De La Torre and Aimee Jackson literally burst into my office at Career and Employment Services one day and said, 'We have been watching Oprah, and did you know Oprah is having an angel network to build 205 houses?'"

The next week, Schuley received an application packet for one of the Oprah houses.

"One of the questions was, 'How are you going to raise money?'" she said. "I was able to write down that Pi Beta Phi sorority, the Pi Phi angels, are already planning on how to raise money for this home."

At the groundbreaking ceremony, De La Torre, sophomore in kinesiology, and Jackson, senior in interior design, presented the family with a welcome mat that read "The Hamiltons: We believe in angels." Then about 50 members sang.

"The Pi Phi's song, that's the highlight of it all," Linnie Hamilton said. "Being that it's the angel house, they're like Oprah's angels. Their song really touches me."

For Pamela Hamilton, the road to the groundbreaking ceremony began during a church service in November when she was listening to a woman's testimony, she said.

"She had me in the back of the church just crying," she said. "I didn't have a clue, but at the end of her talking, I actually had a vision of my children with me on the steps and my kids talking to me. I don't know

Manhattan's 6th Habitat house finds occupants

For Vernita Chambers, a single mother of six children, Habitat for Humanity has given her the chance to own her own house.

Chambers was chosen in March to occupy Habitat's sixth Manhattan house, which will have its ground breaking in late summer or early fall.

"We'll have something that's our home," she said.

"We'll have a swimming pool," her 9-year-old son predicted.

"No," she assured him.

"Someday maybe?"

"No."

While the home might not have a pool, Chambers said it is a step in the right direction, especially because rent payments will go toward buying the house.

"With all the kids that I've got, I couldn't afford to pay for adequate living space for us around here in Manhattan, because it was so expensive for what I make," she said.

Chambers said she has known about the program for a while, but missed the application deadline the first time she considered applying.

"The first time I tried to go ahead and get an application for it, I couldn't find it, so I missed out on it," Chambers said. "When they came around again, I went ahead and filled out the application.

"I didn't really think that I was going to get picked for it," she said. "I was shocked when she said I got it."

Chambers works full time at Arby's Roast Beef Restaurant in the evening while family members babysit her children.

"I wake them up in the morning, so that's when they see me. And when they get home, I see them from like four to five," she said.

Chambers said the house will help her provide for her children, whom she collectively refers to as her babies. They include Champaign Boyd, 10; Andre Boyd, 9; Dymond Chambers, 6; DeVante Boyd, 5; Patrick Goodman, 2; and Tavon Goodman, 1 month.

"It's a start for me. I'm just now starting to get up on my feet," she said. "I'm trying to go back to school, so this is just another step towards my goals I've set for me that I need to meet so me and my babies will be OK."

Chambers listed her goals: "Go to school, take care of my babies, try to send them all to college or help them, but I do want them to go. Make life better for them because I'm doing this all by myself with the help of my family.

"I think I'm doing pretty good," she said. "I'm starting off slow, but at least I'm starting out on the right foot."

Rookie, veteran lead Royals to 7-3 win against Oakland

OAKLAND, Calif. — Rookie Larry Sutton had four hits and Dean Palmer went three-for-four with two RBIs Sunday, leading the Kansas City Royals to a 7-3 win over the Oakland Athletics.

The A's are 4-12, their worst start after 16 games since moving to Oakland in 1968.

Pat Rapp (1-1) survived nine hits and two walks over five 2-3 innings for the win, and was helped by the Royals turning a season-high four double plays.

Jose Rosado pitched three innings for his first save.

Oakland scored in the first when Jason Giambi grounded into a double play with runners at the corners and none out, scoring Rickey Henderson.

Felix Martinez's RBI groundout in the second tied it 1-1.

Palmer's RBI single in the third scored Jose Offerman, breaking a 1-1 tie and keying a three-run rally off Oakland's Ariel Prieto (0-1). Sutton's two-run single later in the inning made it 4-1.

In Oakland's half of the fifth inning, Dave Magadan's RBI single and Matt Stars' third home run of the season brought Oakland within 6-3.

But the Royals added two runs in the fifth on Palmer's RBI triple and Jeff King's bloop run-scoring single.

The Royals added another run in the seventh with Sutton's RBI single off Aaron Small. The single gave him his first four-hit game and put the Royals up 7-3.

Weber State tight end earns title as NFL's 'Mr. Irrelevant'

OWINGS MILLS, Md. — This Quayle knows how to spell potato, although he too found himself to be the butt of jokes Sunday after being the last player selected in the NFL draft.

For years, the final player taken in the draft has been affectionately called "Mr. Irrelevant." The title this year goes to Cam Quayle, a tight end at Weber State, who receives a trip to Disneyland as part of an extended series of events in his honor.

Quayle was the 241st player taken. He was selected by the Baltimore Ravens, who entrusted the job to David Modell, the son of team owner Art Modell.

"It underscores my contribution here," Modell said with a laugh.

Former vice president Dan Quayle once brought unwanted attention to himself by spelling potato with an "e" at the end, and Modell jumped on that shortcoming in explaining why he chose Cam.

"I was asking all the guys I was interviewing whether they could spell potato, and he was the first one who could. So I took him," Modell said.

Quayle didn't know of his pending fame until Ozzie Newsome called him after the pick was made.

"I thought the draft was already over. We don't get ESPN2 in my area," Quayle said. "Then my agent called me, and he couldn't stop laughing."

Said Modell: "I considered taking a kicker with no vowels in his name, but I wanted to pick a player who could actually make the team."

New York mayor pleads case for new stadiums for teams

NEW YORK — Mayor Rudolph Giuliani has made another pitch Sunday for new stadiums for the New York Yankees and New York Mets.

City officials have spent several months discussing finances with the Yankees, the mayor said Sunday. He'd like to build a new stadium in the Bronx, the home of the fabled Yankee Stadium, he added.

"If the Yankees don't want that," the mayor said, "then I'm happy to negotiate. What I don't want is to start some kind of a major negotiation going to other places. Ultimately that will drive up the price for taxpayers."

Another possible site for the proposed baseball-only arena is a 25-acre plot near the Long Island Rail Road yards on 11th Avenue in midtown Manhattan. It would be easier to finance a stadium there than in some parts of the outer boroughs, the mayor said.

There would be no new city taxes to help pay for the stadium, and New Yorkers are in for a real surprise when the mayor reveals the fruits of his financial planning, he said. He would not give further details.

"We're still in the process of formulating plans," Colleen Roche, the mayor's press secretary, said.

Proposed for the Mets is a multipurpose complex in a parking lot next to Shea Stadium in the Flushing section of Queens.

Mets owner Fred Wilpon said the complex would play host to basketball, hockey, track and field and other events, the Daily News reported in its Sunday editions.

The Yankees' lease with the city expires in 2002, the Mets' in 2004.

Engineers and construction workers on Sunday continued to tinker with Yankee Stadium, which turned 75 years old Saturday.

Earlier in the week, a 500-pound steel joint tumbled from the upper level of the landmark ballpark and crashed into the empty seats below. That forced the postponement of two games and sent a third to Shea.

K-STATE CATCHER CHET SAVAGE, RIGHT, TUMBLES TO THE GROUND AFTER BEING HIT BY CAL-STATE NORTHRIDGE'S NAKIA HILL, LEFT, AFTER HILL WAS RUN DOWN NEAR HOME PLATE SUNDAY AT FRANK MYERS FIELD. HILL WAS CALLED OUT ON THE PLAY. K-STATE DEFEATED CAL-STATE NORTHRIDGE 15-14.

Clock, Cal-State Northridge unable to stop Cats

K-State head coach Mike Clark and Cal-State Northridge head coach Mike Batesole got into a verbal altercation in the middle of the sixth inning of K-State's 15-14 win over the Matadors on Sunday.

Clark said he was upset because he said he felt as if their coach was trying to stall the game by taking timeouts to talk to the home plate umpire. Batesole had put a time limit on the game because his team had to catch its flight home.

"I don't like playing time-limit games," Clark said of the altercation. "Baseball isn't meant to have a clock."

However, Batesole didn't stall enough. In the middle half of the eighth inning, the public address announcer made an announcement that the eighth inning would be the last. At that time, Cal-State was up 14-13, and the Cats would receive the last at-bat to try to win the game.

They did.

Shortstop J.D. Loudabarger flied out to left field. Center fielder/pitcher Andy Silva was the first to get on base when he hit a double to left center. First baseman Yancy Ayres singled to left center, scoring Silva and knotting the score at 14.

Michael Hart pinch ran for Ayres. Third baseman Josh Marn, who extended his hitting streak to eight games, singled to the pitcher and reached base while no one was covering first. Matador pitcher Tim Baron intentionally walked right fielder Quinn Cravens to load the bases. Baron then walked catcher Chet Savage, scoring Hart.

"The guys just didn't quit," Clark said. "All weekend it was like that. From an offensive standpoint, the way the guys competed — I was just thoroughly impressed."

Cravens was huge in Sunday's game, going 3-5 with five RBIs, including two homers — his second and third of the series. It was the first time any Cat had hit two homers in one game since Mike Gardner did it against Oral Roberts on May 10 of last year.

Next action
K-State plays No. 5 Baylor a doubleheader at 3 p.m. Tuesday at Frank Myers Field

"It was a great series for me," Cravens said. "I was really hitting the ball well, and it was certainly a confidence booster for me."

Cravens was also the hero of Friday night's 14-13 win over the Matadors — the first game of a doubleheader. Cravens hit a 3-2 fastball down the left field line with two outs left in the bottom of the 14th inning that scored Ayres. The 14-inning affair, which lasted nearly five hours, was the second longest in school history.

In that game Ayres went to the plate a K-State-best nine times, going 4-9 with an RBI and scoring two runs. Loudabarger and Marn each had four-hit games — going 4-6 and 4-7, respectively. Shawnee Heights product Kasey Weishaar hit his first home run of the year in the win. Tom Henshaw came on in the sixth for K-State and earned the win, improving his record to 2-2.

The Cats lost the seven-inning-nightcap of the twinbill 10-7 on Friday night. With the score knotted at six apiece going into the seventh inning, the Matadors broke the shell off losing pitcher David Meares, scoring four runs in the inning. K-State only could answer with one run in its half of the inning.

On Saturday, Cal-State broke open the game by scoring six runs in the top of the eighth to go up 9-5.

The Cats couldn't answer their rally, and the Matadors added two more in the ninth to take game three 11-5.

WEINER'S NFL CALL COMES FROM SEATTLE

A good-looking boyfriend, nice clothes or a good hairstyle can help a teen-age girl's image around a junior high school campus.

Today, though, when 13-year-old Staci Weiner reports to classes in Coral Springs, Fla., she'll really have something to brag about.

Her big brother, former K-State offensive tackle Todd Weiner, is a professional football player, as of Saturday.

"It's pretty cool," Staci Weiner said.

Todd Weiner was selected in the second round of the NFL draft Saturday, 47th overall, by the Seattle Seahawks.

"Any time anyone invests a pick in you, you feel honored," he said. "I really appreciate it."

A few months ago, he wasn't expected to be picked that early, but strong showings at NFL scouting combines and personal workouts improved his stock.

The 6 foot-5 inch, 300-pounder bench pressed 225 pounds 29 times, recorded a 33 1/2-inch vertical jump and ran a 4.9-second 40-yard dash.

Weiner earned four letters for the Wildcats and served as a co-captain last year, but he earned his spot in the draft with his strong workout regimen after the season ended. He spent endless hours running, lifting weights and studying video.

On Saturday, the work paid off.

"I'm happy for Todd because he's worked so hard," Sunny Jacobson, his fiancee, said.

"I'm glad he's got an opportunity to play in the NFL."

She said she's also happy that he'll play in Seattle. She grew up in Alaska, which is only a three-hour flight from Washington, and also has friends and family in neighboring Idaho.

However, the other woman in Weiner's life, his mother, isn't as thrilled. Cindy Weiner lives in southern Florida, quite a trek from Seattle.

"I'm not real happy that it's so far away, but I'm happy for Todd," she said.

She'll still make it to many of the games, though. She admits she doesn't know too much about football, but is a big fan of one player, a new Seahawks offensive tackle. She had a small draft-watching party Saturday, and even though the Seahawks contacted Todd Weiner 10 minutes before the pick was announced on ESPN to let him know, she still called once she saw it on television to make sure he knew he was drafted.

Another one of Todd Weiner's biggest fans, Arne Weiner, had a draft-watching party on Saturday. He's Todd's father, and he said he's glad his son is a Seahawk. He said Seattle's young talent, combined with Todd's good fortunes, will bring the Seahawks to the top of the NFL.

Todd Weiner came to K-State from Taravella High School in Coral Springs, Fla. At the time, he weighed about 220 pounds. He was a tight end in high school, but put on 20 pounds a year in high school to make the transition to tackle. It wasn't easy, but he finally made it to 300 pounds last season.

"Todd puts his mind to do something, and he does it," Arne Weiner said.

He's had trouble keeping weight on during the season. He started last fall at 300 pounds but dropped down to the mid-280s by the time the Cats got to the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl on Dec. 31. Weiner can get by at 300 pounds in the NFL, but 280 could be undersized.

He said he's not worried about staying heavy in Seattle, though.

"Part of the reason I couldn't keep weight on was that just like other college students, I didn't have the money to eat well. I was living on Burger King and McDonald's," he said. "With the money I'll get, I'll be able to eat well."

Weiner is probably right. If his contract is comparable to last year's 47th pick, former K-State wide receiver Kevin Lockett, he'll be able to eat anything he wants.

Lockett signed a three-year, $1.425 million deal with a $585,000 signing bonus. He earned $224,000 last season, will make $280,000 this year and is scheduled to receive $336,000 in 1999.

TODD WEINER HOISTS THE TOSTITOS FIESTA BOWL CHAMPIONSHIP TROPHY AT A MEN'S BASKETBALL GAME EARLIER THIS YEAR. WEINER WAS THE 2ND ROUND NFL DRAFT PICK OF THE SEATTLE SEAHAWKS.

Weiner said he likes to eat two entrees when he goes to restaurants, and if he can average $475,000 a year, as Lockett does, he'll have no problem coming up with money for the tip. He said he's not going to buy any flashy cars or expensive vacation homes.

Jacobson said he's putting the money away for security and shouldn't have any problems living a simple lifestyle.

"He gets a scholarship check for $300 a month. He's used to getting by on that, so he'll be fine."

DURING AUDITIONS FOR AN UPCOMING MTV SHOW, SERAPHINE NAEYMI, SENIOR IN ELECTRONIC JOURNALISM, TALKS TO A GROUP OF CANDIDATES ABOUT BOYFRIENDS AND DATING. GROUPS OF SEVEN TO 10 CANDIDATES WERE INTERVIEWED ON THE PATIO BEHIND LAST CHANCE RESTAURANT & SALOON IN AGGIEVILLE ON SUNDAY AFTERNOON.

K-State students chance their luck at local audition for MTV program

Sitting around a bar, talking about dating could result in a K-State student leaving school mid-finals week and traveling across the country on MTV's bill.

MTV's casting coordinator, Brendon Blincoe, met with more than 70 K-State students at Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon on Sunday in his cross-country search to fill seven positions for MTV's upcoming show "Drive-Thru America."

"I was told to go to Oklahoma or Kansas and interview sort of separate types of groups," Blincoe said. "I was told K-State had more people actually from Kansas, and that is ideally what I want — someone who has never been out."

Students and Manhattan residents between the ages of 18 and 26 participated in informal group interviews at Chance between noon and 3 p.m.

Participants were interviewed for about 20 minutes in groups of about 10. Questions ranged from best and worst dating experiences to creative ways to ask out other people.

People were not judged by the quality of their responses but on their personality while answering, Blincoe said.

"Personality is No. 1," he said. "There has to be something that makes that person stand out. It's not the number of piercings or the crazy hair that counts, but just someone who stands out from the group for any reason."

From the starting group, about 40 people were chosen to do one-on-one interviews with Blincoe. These interviews were taped and sent to MTV's main office in New York. The final decision will be made in the last week of April.

"I probably don't have much of a chance because there are so many people, but it doesn't matter," Greg Carabelas, finalist and Manhattan resident, said. "I thought it would be fun. I just did it for kicks."

K-State was the first stop for Blincoe. However, he said he already had 50 finalists from previous contestants on other MTV shows, friends and friends of friends. He also has stops at three campuses, including the University of Kansas and three random cities.

Although he said K-State finalists had just as good of a chance as anyone else, he expected to have a large variety of finalists before the April 27 deadline.

"I was in Westport last night and just saw a couple of people who caught my eye. I interviewed three people who just happened to be in the same bar I was," Blincoe said.

The seven people chosen for the show will leave from Seaside, Calif. on May 15 for the two-week trek. Every couple of days, the group will stop for a contest such as sky diving or wilderness survival, and the loser of the contest will be cut from the trip. Only one person will remain when the road trip ends in Seaside, N.J. That person will win the opportunity to be an MTV VJ for one week.

"If I'm just myself, I can make anyone laugh," said Deke Gibson, finalist and senior in elementary education. "I have a big mouth as it is, so if it comes down to that, I think it's something I'd really fit into."

The trip begins in California on May 15. If a K-State student wins, he or she might have to work around finals.

"I figure you only live once, and I could always work something out with my teachers. I would leave during finals if I had too," Gibson said.

The "Road Rules"-type show will air on MTV this summer after the group finishes its trip.

"I HAVE A BIG MOUTH AS IT IS, SO IF IT COMES DOWN TO THAT, I THINK IT'S SOMETHING I'D REALLY FIT INTO."

Ultimate Fake Book wins 4 awards including best band, song

PHIL KELLUM
Kansas State Collegian

Manhattan's Ultimate Fakebook traveled to Kansas City, Mo.'s Folly Theater on April 11, but not to play.

Fakebook attended the second annual Pitch Weekly Klammies award ceremony, where they were nominated for five awards. The band ended up winning four of them.

The four awards Ultimate Fakebook won were best alternative/rock band, song of the year for "Far, Far Away," album of the year for "Electric Kissing Parties" and band of the year. The only one the band didn't bring back to Manhattan was vocalist/guitarist Bill McShane's best male vocalist nomination.

Ultimate Fakebook captured more nominations than any other band, and also more awards than anyone else, beating out Kansas City and Lawrence luminaries such as Shiner, Outhouse and Danger Bob, as well as fellow Manhattanites, Sufferbus.

McShane said it was a complete surprise to win four Klammies.

"We didn't expect to win one. We were just totally glad to get nominated. We had no idea that would be the outcome," he said.

Drummer Eric Melin said it was an honor simply to be nominated.

"It was an honor to be nominated in the first place with all the other really good bands, and then to win was pretty unbelievable," he said.

Melin also said he hoped the awards would make other people think that what they do is worth it.

"The way I look at it is it was a chance for people to look at us in a different way. It kinda validates all the hard work and everything that you put into it and makes you feel that somebody is recognizing you for getting no sleep and ruining your life to do this," he said jokingly.

For the past six months, Ultimate Fakebook has played in the Kansas City area or Lawrence at least once a week, and Melin said he thinks that is part of the reason people voted for Ultimate Fakebook.

"We're actually starting to get to the point where we're starting to build up a following, and we're selling a lot of stuff. So besides our friends and family who sent stuff in, the people who come see us who actually got the Pitch really went out of their way to vote for us," he said.

More than 1,000 votes were cast in total by ordinary music fans in the area.

"We're nominated by the business-type people, but we're voted by people, so it's a totally huge honor," McShane said.

Melin said he was just happy the Pitch allowed Manhattan bands to be included in the balloting, because it was for Kansas City/Lawrence area bands.

"We play there more often than we play in Manhattan, because there's obviously a lot more bars to play at and a lot more opportunities. When we won song of the year, I dedicated it to Sufferbus, Roach Factory, Truck Stop Love, Moving Van Goghs and all the bands from Manhattan that have been playing in Kansas City and Lawrence that never got any respect," he said.

Both McShane and Melin said they were happy with the results.

"That is kind of overwhelming. We're still a little bit freaked out, but it's very cool," McShane said.

"It's cool," Melin said. "I think it's going to be really good for Manhattan."

Speaker stresses understanding

COLLEGIAN STAFF

People need to understand themselves before they can understand others, a University Counseling Services therapist said during the second phase of the American Ethnic Studies Student Association's Student Diversity Leadership Initiative.

"Unless you understand who you are, you are never going to figure out who other people are," Ata Karim said during his presentation, "Understanding Your Cultural Self."

> "UNLESS YOU UNDERSTAND WHO YOU ARE, YOU ARE NEVER GOING TO FIGURE OUT WHO OTHER PEOPLE ARE."
> ATA KARIM
> University Counseling Service therapist

Karim asked questions to help participants realize that they, as Americans, are part of a culture.

"What do you think is more important in this culture, the individual, or the group?" Karim asked. "What is the nature of people?"

Karim said different cultures interpret things, from silence to scent, differently.

"Silence is different dependent upon background," he said.

Participants were instructed to give a one-minute presentation of the meaning of their name, as well as to break into groups and explain concepts like justice, authority and gender relations by using symbols.

Mariana Lebron, coordinator of student life at K-State-Salina, said the presentation taught her that being of the American culture wasn't always something of which to be proud.

"I learned that we are ashamed of some things of our culture," Lebron said. "Sometimes we wish that certain things weren't true."

Later, participants split into different groups and attended workshops.

Juanita McGowan, director of the American Ethnic Studies program at K-State, said sometimes people can't avoid being prejudiced during her workshop, "Inter-Group Relations: Avoiding Cultural Collision."

"We carry a cultural bag, and in that cultural bag and if we look out from within that cultural bag, the sum of our way of living, we can't help but be prejudicial," she said.

She said this is caused by ignorance and questioned why a proactive approach isn't taken if people are being hurt.

"We don't even have accurate information, and we base our stereotypes on that," McGowan said. "Regardless of what groups we represent, we've all been victimized."

Andrew Jones, freshman undecided, said the problem is groups don't intermingle.

"I think that with the lack of interaction, the groups interact with themselves, and I think the stereotype is just going to perpetuate because they'll talk about other people," Jones said.

McGowan said the role the American Ethnic Studies Student Association could play would be to help interaction.

"It needs to be a group that helps pull this campus together," she said.

Jones said diversity problems come from within ourselves.

"Maybe it's not the collision that's the bad part, maybe it's how we handle it," he said.

Powwow shakes Ahearn with sounds of Native American culture, heritage

Native American drummers produced a sound that shook the rafters at Ahearn Field House this weekend. The drummers beat out a rhythm for dancers competing in the 10th Annual Spring Powwow sponsored by the Native American Student Body on Saturday.

Drummers played for about 175 dancers competing in several different categories and age divisions.

Gourd dancing preceded the children's dance contest. Terry Tsotigh, arena director and head dance judge, said children learn their dancing technique at a young age.

"As soon as they are able to walk, they are learning to dance," he said. "They learn from watching their parents and grandparents."

Gourd dancing, which originated in Oklahoma, traditionally is done in the springtime when the skunkberry bush is in full bloom. The dance relates the story of two warring tribes that met in a field of skunkberry bushes. The red berries mixed with the injured warriors' blood create a bright red hue. Tsotigh said the dance today is in honor of tribal warriors.

"We dance to commemorate our military veterans," he said. "We can learn a lot from their struggles and heroism."

About 75 children participated in the afternoon portion of the dance contest.

They wore elaborate costumes made from feathers, beads and leather.

Donald Bread, master of ceremonies for the powwow, said the children dancing in the tiny tots division, ages zero through seven, danced well.

"They all danced so hard," he said. "How can we pick just one? All of them danced well enough to win first prize."

Dancing was not the only reason for the powwow, Bread said. It was coming together and celebrating and continuing traditions.

"Dancing is just one way we preserve our heritage," he said. "I have a daughter, and I love to see her compete in these competitions. But that is not what this is all about.

"It is about passing down our people's customs. It is sharing our talents with others. Coming to KSU is a good way to promote education and encourage continued advancement. We are proud to share with everyone our heritage."

Police warn about risks of alcoholism to the stores and go to the bars might be a little difficult, but it is going on. I don't think it would be a big problem, but it is going to depend on what they're looking for."

Bars provide the biggest challenge, said Pat Tolin, 20 and a junior in construction science, said.

"They are a bigger problem than actually just getting alcohol to drink at your house," he said. "Everyone's willing to buy it for you."

Bars might provide a challenge, but not one that cannot be overcome, Tolin said.

"We're getting close enough to 21," he said. "Fake IDs are pretty easy to come by, too."

The RCPD made more than 80 arrests for minor in possession in 1997. Those arrested sometimes claimed it was the bar's fault for serving them, Conkwright said.

"The bars have a responsibility, that's true," he said. "But so do the people who know that they are underage who are trying to find ways to go into these bars and drink."

While underage drinkers put themselves at risk, Conkwright said they put the bars at risk, too.

"To the minor who gets arrested, they'll probably get a fine, probation and whatever the court determines," he said. "The business, once they have hearings through ABC, can be fined. They can even have their doors closed for a length of time. That runs into a lot more money than people realize.

"It's almost like going in there and robbing a place," Conkwright said. "When you rob a place, you take money out of the income and everybody who works there. Same thing if you go into a bar and drink."

Hendrix said the main reason the law is not followed is because it is not enforced.

"It doesn't matter what you do to it if people don't enforce it," he said.

Conkwright said education is the key to ending underage drinking.

"I think college students can be educated about how law enforcement works and what we do when it comes to our job dealing with alcohol," Conkwright said.

"They can be taught like everyone else the dangers dealing with alcohol — how alcohol affects the body. They should know that alcohol can affect you differently each time you go out drinking.

"College students are very intelligent people," he said. "So, for them, it's just a matter of recognizing their responsibility like anyone else. Partying and enjoying college are a part of college, but that needs to be kept in a proper perspective."

To educate students about alcohol, Conkwright said he speaks to fraternities and sororities about underage drinking.

During the presentations, he explains procedures and common offenses for underage students: possession on the street, possession of an open container, minor in possession, driving under the influence and transporting an open container. Conkwright also discusses Zero Tolerance, a law that affects underage drivers who register at .02 on a breath test, compared to .08 for DUI offenders.

Groups interested in having Conkwright speak to them can reach him at 537-6100 to set up an appointment.

"I think the biggest thing is that people are becoming more aware," he said. "They are becoming a lot more concerned. The college students think that there are different things where they are being picked on more, and they're not.

"What you've got to realize is that when we're in Manhattan, we're not going to be bashful about doing our jobs," Conkwright said.

"We're more than willing to go out and help anybody," he said. "If you have a group that is interested in a class or something where we can help demonstrate, all we need is a call."

Use or abuse checklist

- ☐ Inability to control amount of drinking
- ☐ Uses alcohol to escape problems
- ☐ Change in personality
- ☐ High tolerance level
- ☐ Frequent blackouts while drinking
- ☐ Problems at work or in school resulting from drinking
- ☐ Concern shown by family and friends about drinking

If someone you know fits two or more of the above characteristics, then he or she probably has a drinking problem.

why. To me that was a symbol that I was supposed to find my children a home."

The Hamiltons began looking into getting a loan. Then Pamela Hamilton discovered an application for Habitat in the library. After several interviews at their house, the couple found out in late February that they would occupy Manhattan's fifth house at 504 S. Manhattan Ave.

Pamela Hamilton said she is excited she only has to move one more time, as moving is a chore she said she has become used to doing about once a year. She said she is looking forward to decorating her home the way she wants and being connected to the community.

"Already, I see myself driving up and down that area," she said.

"It's where you are going to live and own property. It also gets you in touch with the community. This is kind of neat for me to see things in a different way. You start being aware of a lot of different things."

The family is scheduled to move in on Oct. 1, but if Linnie Hamilton has his way, the house will be done well before the move-in date, he said.

"They say it's going to be done in October, but if I can get my brother-in-law in on it, we'll be through with it in about a month," he said, laughing. "I've been saying, 'Why don't you fellows come,' because they build motels and houses as a business."

The couple will pay back an interest-free loan to Habitat and eventually own the house. In addition, both of the Hamiltons have to put 200 hours of volunteer time into building the house or helping with other community service projects.

The couple also will look for a little help from their four children: Roger Colon, 16; Amber Colon, 14; Kandra Hamilton, 11; and Richie Colon, 8. Richie is especially excited to help, Linnie Hamilton said. At the groundbreaking, Richie jumped on his shovel as Major Bruce Snead advised him.

"He's really the one who wants to do it all," Linnie Hamilton said. "He's the one who really wants to get down into the construction."

Pi Phis have raised about $15,000 for the house.

They plan to finish raising money in the fall.

"Lindsey and Aimee have put some real excitement into it," Mark Meseke, Habitat's media-relations coordinator, said. "Sometimes raising money can be a real drudgery, but they put some real excitement into it."

Knowing how they have helped the family is their motivation, Jackson said.

"We had the family over for dinner last Wednesday," she said, "and I think it put everything in perspective to take the time and see that we are actually making a difference in someone's life."

AIDS benefit auction suffers poor turnout that high, and we want to tell them the facts."

To raise funds to help get the facts out, Dorst and Battles planned the Spring Fling, at which 12 volunteer bachelors and bachelorettes were auctioned off.

Because of the disappointing turnout, the cost for a bachelor or bachelorette was especially low, costing buyers anywhere from $3 to $30.

Angel Skaggs, senior in family and consumer sciences education, explained how she decided which of the bachelors to purchase when the prices were all so low.

"Well, I wanted the money to go to the project. He happened to compliment my boots, so I bought him," Skaggs said.

Once they had been purchased, the bachelors and bachelorettes were to spend the rest of the evening dancing with their buyers.

One of those bachelors, Matthew Jackson from Fort Riley, explained how he felt the night had gone.

"It's been loads of fun. I've had a great time," Jackson said.

Dorst said she thought the fact everyone was having fun made up for the financial shortcomings of the evening.

"We've all had a lot of fun tonight," Dorst said.

"We'll have a meeting to discuss what could have been done differently, but we'll definitely do this again next year."

Residence halls educate students about drinking

BARBARA HOLLINGSWORTH
Kansas State Collegian

Editor's Note: This story is the second in a weeklong series about alcohol use and abuse by K-State students.

Finding one of his residents passed out in his own vomit in a Moore Hall bathroom at 3 a.m. is an experience Amir Hajdar, Moore resident assistant, hasn't forgotten.

"I wasn't sure how long he had been there" or if he was alive, Hajdar, senior in computer science, said. "Luckily, an ambulance came in and pumped his stomach out and let him go.

"I hadn't expected to see anything like that ever," he said of the event, which occurred about a year ago.

Binge drinking and underage drinking is a problem nationwide and in the residence halls, Haymaker Hall Residence Life Coordinator Todd Clark said.

"One positive thing I've seen is in my hall here, we haven't had a single person taken to the hospital for drinking (this year)," said Clark, who is also the adviser of K-State's Association of Residence Halls. "The fact that I'm impressed with that shows the severity of the problem."

Clark said students know about the effects of binge drinking when they move into the halls.

"They know the facts about alcohol," he said. "They've been drilled on that through their lives, and we try to reinforce it. The hardest challenge is to change their behavior."

When residents are thought to violate the residence hall alcohol policy, a staff member will investigate the situation and write a report.

"The staff goes up there, and they have the right to ask for identification," said Brian Glick, sophomore in journalism and mass communications and Marlatt Hall chief justice. "Staff does have the right to confiscate their alcohol or pour it down the drain."

The hall director also will receive information about the violation.

"Typically your first offense, you're going to come down to talk to me, and you'll try to work things out," Clark said. "If it keeps happening, then they might meet with the board."

Housing and Dining Services Judicial Board meets with those involved to decide if there was a violation and impose sanctions.

"Some of the more common sanctions are having the person write a paper," Glick, also the chancellor-

See HALLS PROVIDE RULES, Page 10

Students' behavior often violates the following K-State residence hall alcohol policies:

- Only students 21 and older can drink 3.2-percent alcohol in the residence halls.
- Residents of legal age are responsible for minors if they knowingly supply them with alcohol.
- Students only can drink in their rooms or the rooms of other residents of legal age. They cannot drink in public areas.
- Residents of legal age can't store more than two cases of a cereal malt beverage at a time and may store any alcohol in a sealed container that is not larger than one gallon.

Musician relates experience of Holocaust survivor

A Holocaust survivor who was forced to play music for Nazis in concentration camps told her emotional story Monday night during a book tour.

That was the premise of the performance piece "An Evening With Madame F," which was performed in Forum Hall by Claudia Stevens, a musical and dramatic performer.

A multifaceted play that utilized acting, song and music, Madame F told the story of Fania Fenelon, a real-life Holocaust survivor who, as a Jewish prisoner in a concentration camp, was enlisted in an orchestra to entertain her Nazi captors.

"Madame F" explored the powerful emotions and day-to-day struggles of conscience that Fenelon and the other orchestra members went through. Through chronological narrative and interpretation, the audience was led through the emotional highs and lows of Fenelon and her fellow prisoners.

Stevens conveyed the fear and powerlessness of Fenelon, while also showing how the orchestra members tried to rise above their condition and gain a shred of strength, and also to justify their compliance with the Nazis.

At one point the orchestra tried to rebel by playing forbidden songs, songs unapproved by the Nazis, even if it meant punishment. However, the plan failed.

"There is no punishment — they are too stupid to recognize the tunes," Stevens said as Fenelon. "Such is our pitiful revenge."

The orchestra not only offered some protection for the members, but also at times kept their morale intact.

"It was not just a chance for life, but for some meaning," she said.

But after two orchestra members died in a desperate rush on an electric fence, Fenelon lost the desire to live. At that point the performance merged into a surreal sequence of half-consciousness, accompanied by ethereal, alien electronic music.

"I dream of silence, and then it is silence. The guns have stopped," a ghostly recording of Fenelon's voice said, as she lay on the ground.

In a state of near-death, Fenelon was rescued by a British soldier.

Stevens, a veteran of stage, television and radio.

She played the piano and sang many of the songs the orchestra might have played for the Nazis. Her voice ranged from a whisper to a bellowing tremolo that sent echoes through the room. The music and electronic sounds were composed and arranged by Fred Cohen.

After the performance, Stevens answered questions from the audience. She created the piece nine years ago. She said the piece is different with every performance, depending mainly on the feeling conveyed by the audience.

While the character was based on the writings of one woman, Stevens said she drew from other sources.

"I've also added ideas and meditations of other survivors," she said.

The individual songs performed in the piece are not necessarily the same the orchestra played, nor do they have any symbolic meaning, Stevens said.

"It's really not what she sings," she said. "It's that she sings."

"IT WAS NOT JUST A CHANCE FOR LIFE, BUT FOR SOME MEANING."

K-State suspends Kappa Alpha Psi for alleged hazing

JOE HURLA
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State chapter of Kappa Alpha Psi was suspended Monday after what appears to have been a weekend hazing incident that left one of its alumni members in the Intensive Care Unit of the University of Kansas Medical Center.

The Beta Psi chapter of Kappa Alpha Psi was suspended indefinitely by Pat Bosco, dean of student life. Suspension is the preliminary step before the fraternity's expulsion from campus.

Bosco said the chapter was being suspended because of violations of the K-State Student Conduct Code. The code states that hazing is defined as "an act which endangers the mental or physical health or safety of a student … for the purpose of initiation, admission into, affiliation with, or as a condition for continued membership in, a group or organization."

The man who was the subject of the alleged hazing, Ernest L. Harris Jr., remains in serious but stable condition at the KU Medical Center with injuries to his back and kidneys.

Dr. Ben Cowley of the KU Medical Center said it was clear Harris' injuries were severe, but he is unsure of the extent of treatment that will be required.

"His kidneys have been injured and are not functional. We plan to begin what will be, hopefully, temporary dialysis," Cowley said.

Cowley said the length of time that dialysis will be required remains a question, because Harris' injuries were so recent.

Class size may affect learning experience

JOE HURLA
Kansas State Collegian

One factor that traditionally has been used by students in choosing a college is the student-teacher ratio. But Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said while these numbers are important to incoming students, their relevance is often overestimated.

"Class size and the availability and accessibility of faculty are continuing concerns of prospective students and parents," Bosco said. "But students soon find that you can't just look at class size. You have to consider how accessible and how approachable our faculty are."

He said the accessibility of K-State's faculty is higher than at many other schools, although K-State's student-teacher ratio of 15.2 to 1 ranks slightly behind KU at 14.7 to 1 and Colorado at 14 to 1.

Some K-State teachers take extra steps to remain accessible, he said.

"Our teachers also do something that really shows their willingness to help students — they give out their home phone numbers," Bosco said.

This willingness to help students is especially important when there are fewer teachers per student, said Yar Ebadi, dean of the College of Business Administration, which has a student-teacher ratio of 22.9 to 1.

Mark Shapiro, head of the Department of Architecture, said it is important for faculty to be accessible to students even when the ratio is lower. He said teachers in the College of Architecture, Planning and Design still must make themselves available, despite a student-teacher ratio of 10.7 to 1.

Shapiro also said he felt lower student-teacher ratios are especially important in certain areas of education in the architecture college.

"The central classes are design studios, so it is very important that we maintain low numbers," he said.

Vicki Clegg, director of the Office of Educational Advancement, said she agreed the type of class was important when deciding if the size of the class was important.

"It could matter, depending on what you are trying to learn," Clegg said. "If you're trying to learn upper-level thinking skills, smaller class size is definitely important."

This lack of interaction is the reason Ebadi and his staff are dedicated to helping students, but it only goes so far in making up for a small supply of teachers, Ebadi said.

"When you have committed faculty, you can help, but I just don't know how far we can stretch," he said.

Pro-life protestors used threats, violence during clinic protests, Chicago jury says

CHICAGO — In an unusual use of a racketeering law designed to fight the mob, a federal jury ruled Monday that pro-life protest organizers used threats and violence to shut down clinics — a verdict that could cost the movement millions.

Although the pro-life organizers were ordered to pay only about $258,000, the class-action ruling opened the door for more claims by as many as 1,000 clinics across the country.

"This is the biggest courtroom defeat for the anti-abortion movement ever," declared Fay Clayton, an attorney for the National Organization for Women, which filed the lawsuit in 1986.

Defense attorneys said they will appeal.

The jury found that pro-life activist Joseph Scheidler and two associates, Timothy Murphy and Andrew Scholberg, engaged in 21 acts of extortion to shut down clinics. The jury also found that two pro-life organizations, the Pro-Life Action League and Operation Rescue, were part of the scheme.

The jury ordered the three activists and two organizations to pay $85,926.92 in damages, which will be tripled under the racketeering law.

The damages were awarded to abortion clinics in Milwaukee and Wilmington, Del., for security measures required after violence flared outside their doors. But a number of other clinics intend to file for class-action damages under the verdict.

"They want to bankrupt us — there's no question about that," said Scheidler, executive director of the Pro-Life Action League.

U.S. District Judge David Coar scheduled a hearing for Wednesday at which he is expected to discuss a court order to curb violence at clinics.

Federal money will not fund clean needles for addicts; communities urged to help

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Programs that let drug addicts exchange used needles for clean ones fight AIDS and do not encourage illegal drug use, the Clinton administration declared Monday — but it will not allow federal tax dollars to fund the programs.

The administration said it hopes a strong endorsement will encourage communities to start their own needle exchanges. But AIDS activists have said that federal money — so far banned — is key, and they see the decision, announced Monday by Health and Human Services Secretary Donna Shalala, as a defeat.

"We have concluded that needle exchange programs, as part of a comprehensive HIV prevention program, will decrease the transmission of HIV and will not encourage the use of illegal drugs," Shalala said Monday.

But she said the program should be designed — and funded — by local communities. Asked why a program could not be designed locally but federally funded, she said: "We had to make a choice. It was a decision. It was a decision to leave it to local communities."

An administration official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the decision to endorse the programs was based on science, but the decision not to fund them came after consultations with the White House.

Shalala is telling state and local officials that to start a needle exchange, the programs must be part of a comprehensive HIV prevention strategy that includes referring participants to drug treatment and counseling.

Also, needles must be made available only on a replacement basis.

AIDS activists were stunned by the decision, questioning how federal public health officials could say that needle exchanges work but then decline to fund them.

"It's like saying the world is not flat but not funding Columbus' voyage," said Daniel Zingale of the activist group AIDS Action.

"It's politics rather than public science," added Winnie Stachelberg of the Human Rights Campaign. "Local communities have been scraping together programs for the last several years, but it's clear federal funds are needed."

Needle-exchange programs are one of the hottest topics in the AIDS crisis.

Half of all people who contract HIV are infected by dirty needles, sex with injecting drug users or are children of infected addicts — totaling 33 people every day, AIDS experts say.

Demand for new impotency pill skyrockets though many stores have yet to receive it

NEW YORK CITY — Duke University Medical School urologist Craig Donatucci has given up answering calls about the new pill for impotence.

Patients asking about Pfizer Inc.'s drug, Viagra, now get a recorded message: "Because of the volume of patient calls for Viagra, Dr. Donatucci is unable to take phone calls concerning this new drug."

Although the drug started hitting pharmacy shelves earlier this month, many druggists haven't received their first shipment, and doctors still are evaluating the latest impotence treatment. But patients aren't waiting to get in line.

Viagra captured a whopping 79 percent of the market from rival impotence drugs during its second week of sales, through April 10, according to IMS America, a research-information company that reported the figures late Monday.

The drug had 5 percent of the market during limited availability the previous week, and Pfizer said it didn't expect it to be widely available until April 15.

The drug's popularity more than doubled the total number of impotence prescriptions filled in the United States, from a total of 20,106 in the week ended April 3 to 54,474 in the week ended April 10.

Atlanta urologist John Stripling wore out his hand writing 500 prescriptions in two weeks. Now he's using a rubber stamp to prescribe the pill.

"I've never seen such interest in a prescription drug in all of my years of medicine," said Stripling, who had 300 people waiting for the drug to become available and is getting 25 calls a day from interested patients.

Donatucci said he's written 150 prescriptions and is scheduling appointments for those who get his message.

Doctors and drug-industry analysts said they expect Viagra to eclipse competing impotence nostrums within months.

The drug owes its popularity less to what it does than to what it doesn't do: make men wince. Existing impotence drugs must be either injected into the penis or inserted into the urinary tract.

Two men in five have problems getting an erection at age 40. Nearly seven in 10 do at age 70. Pfizer said it estimates the number of men with impotence worldwide at 140 million.

The drug should bring Pfizer $300 million in sales during the rest of the year, said Mariola Hagger, an analyst with Deutsche Morgan Grenfell. Many analysts expect it to bring in more than $1 billion in annual sales after 2000.

"It doesn't make you 21 again, but it does solve the problem," said Robert W. Shay, a 70-year-old Los Angeles resident who took part in clinical trials of the drug from 1996 to 1997.

Shay, who used to take performance-boosting injections, said Viagra works about as well as the shots but is more discreet and less painful.

The drug originally was intended as a treatment for angina. It was supposed to increase blood flow to the heart, but the rush of blood filled another organ instead. Pfizer decided one man's side effect was another man's cure and developed it as an impotence treatment.

"BARNUM S. BAILEY ON CRACK," BY KEVIN JOHNSTON, SENIOR IN FINE ART, IS ONE OF THE ART PIECES ON DISPLAY IN WILLARD HALL ART GALLERY. JOHNSTON'S MEDIUM IS OIL ON CANVAS.

WILLARD GALLERY SHOWCASES STUDENT ART

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Late in any semester, student art begins to creep out of the studios and into campus galleries.

Its appearance is expected and mostly welcome, because it's not every day student art gets a voice. The shows that fill the last few weeks of the semester give one pause — just what are my contemporaries learning over in Willard Hall? And so the opportunity to see what a vast range of art students are doing is not one that should be taken lightly.

Which is just the case with the Art Department Scholarship Winners show, hanging in the Willard art gallery until Friday. Everything from graphic design to sculpture to painting to drawing is included in this — at times interesting, at times scary — show of student art.

Obviously, not all scholarship winners necessarily rank as great artists, but surely all are great students. And some of the work reeks of freshman-level class work. But is that the point? Of course not — the lower level (to be kind) work simply demonstrates where many of these artists start eventually to transcend to occasional heights by their senior year. And it works vice versa in reminding those senior geniuses that they are but four years removed from their gallery mates.

Art Review

In any case, there is some brilliant work in the show. Nik Meisel's two bronze sculptures immediately will draw your eye to the northwest corner of the gallery. There sits "Zero A," almost crucifix like. It is a tall, elongated totem pole of post-apocalyptic figures, snakes and skeletal remains straining to hold their form.

It's a cold vision of a future, perhaps a mix between Mad Max and hip-hop street culture. Don't pass by the piece without checking out the bottom of the back, where Meisel's Imp character (seen on the adjacent Meisel sculpture, "Imp; 23 Shots") is kneeling down, laughingly asking you to keep quiet.

Another interesting piece is Nathaniel Abner's shlocky, ersatz, untitled, fake-fur-covered box with a nail-lined interior. This study in contrasts between delicate and menacing materials surprisingly recalls the work of surrealist Meret Oppenheim, whose 1936 fur-covered cup, saucer and spoon are still as weirdly amusing some 62 years later.

Graphic design students continue to tear apart conventional expectations with their studies of type. Witness Jill Stoppel's "3-D Q," a silver-metallic explosion of tin that surreptitiously resembles the letter that usually precedes "u."

There are some serious paintings in the show, particularly the work of Tobias Becker and Kevin Johnston. Becker's "Bird Box: Red Plot," mixed media on paper, sets up a throbbing rhythm of red hill forms connected by black lines without becoming a pattern. His adjacent "Bird Box: White Plot," follows suit but further is enlivened by the paper underneath — in this case the outer cover to a commercial art pad.

Johnston's exploration of space and light, "Barnum S. Bailey on Crack," oil on canvas, consists mainly of two colors: red and brown. The painting's cantilevered bars and eerie voids recall avant garde architectural drawings, suggesting a fantasy "place" of an unnatural, skewed perspective.

Begin your tour of the show by taking a left at the entrance, just so you'll finish your round by looking at Kam Dubois' graceful "Angel Standing By," as sensitive a digital illustration as you're likely to see. Imagine French actress Catherine Denueve with soft wings and long, flowing hair, and you'll have an idea of the understated elegance of the small piece.

Blood drive continues 50 years of service

NATE JENKINS
Kansas State Collegian

The tradition of American Red Cross blood drives will continue Wednesday and Thursday at Pottorf Hall in CiCo Park when the Riley County chapter will have a drive honoring 50 years of blood service.

Since 1948, blood donors in the central plains region of the American Red Cross have helped save the lives of severe accident victims, cancer patients, transplant recipients and surgery patients.

Riley County Drive chairwoman Heidi Mitchell said walk-in donors are welcome between noon and 6:30 p.m. Wednesday and between 8 a.m. and noon Thursday, but she recommends calling the local Red Cross to make an appointment.

"It really doesn't take much time, usually about an hour once they start drawing the blood, and we'll have lots of free doughnuts for everybody," Mitchell said. "I think some don't come because they worry about the possibility of getting AIDS, but that's impossible."

Contracting the HIV virus is impossible because the blood-collecting materials, most importantly the needle, are only used once on one person before they are disposed of, Mitchell said.

Aside from not worrying about contracting HIV, donors should take a couple simple steps before giving blood on Wednesday or Thursday.

The Red Cross recommends eating regular meals and drinking lots of fluids before and after donating, wearing non-constrictive clothing and bringing a form of identification. People who have received a tattoo within the past year are not allowed to give blood, but body piercing is acceptable if it was done with a sterile needle.

Manhattan resident John Kramer said he has donated about 85 times over the years. That comes to about 10 1/2 gallons of his blood that has helped needy people.

He said his reasons for donating are simple.

"I just always thought there was the chance it might help someone," Kramer said.

He said possible donors shouldn't shy away just because it would cause too much discomfort.

"It's just a prick of the needle, not painful at all, and the whole procedure has never caused me any discomfort," he said.

Want to give blood? Call 537-2180 to make an appointment.

Alleged hazing incident not indicative of greek system

In an incident of alleged hazing, a recent graduate was beaten so severely with a paddle that he was hospitalized in serious condition Saturday night.

A student who desired to belong to the reputable K-State Beta Psi chapter of the Kappa Alpha Psi fraternity has an injured back and will have to undergo kidney dialysis.

No arrests have been made and the investigation is ongoing, although it's certain participation in this incident or any hazing scenarios should not be tolerated at K-State.

An acceptable place exists within the greek system for rituals and traditions. There is also a place for initiation ceremonies, but this incident was none of the above.

The K-State Student Conduct Code flatly defines hazing as "an act which endangers the mental or physical health or safety of a student ... for the purpose of initiation, admission into, affiliation with, or as a condition for continued membership in, a group or organization."

And K-State's policies against hazing came as a result of nationwide incidents that resulted in injuries similar to this one.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, and the university administration were right to act so swiftly by suspending the K-State Beta Psi chapter of Kappa Alpha Psi.

This type of behavior cannot and should not be tolerated.

This incident has drawn state and national notice. K-State and the entire greek community are marred by an event that involved only a few people.

It's important to note that the actions of the suspended fraternity are not indicative of the entire greek system. And although this fraternity has existed at K-State since the 1960s, people should not try to draw parallels between this fraternity and the greek system as a whole.

Thankfully, this appears to be an isolated incident at K-State.

Unfortunately, though, we can't go back in time and fix the damage that has already scarred the image of the greek system at K-State and across the nation.

GETTIN' THAT WARM FUZZY FEELIN' AGAIN

"The little critters of nature. They don't know that they're ugly. That's very funny, a fly marrying a bumblebee. I told you I'd shoot, but you didn't believe me! WHY didn't you BELIEVE me?" — Stinky Wizzleteats, "The Happy Happy Joy Joy Song"

This isn't to say I hate animals. On the contrary, most cats adore me, cows speak to me in hushed tones and squirrels do my bidding when the sun sets. I just have second thoughts about the integration of domesticated animals into non-rural environments.

Maybe it's because of Trent, that adorable little feline I made the acquaintance of a few years back. He was a homeless little twerp wandering around in front of Kinko's at 2 in the morning — or was that me? No, wait, he was meowing, that's right. I had the apartment, he got a litter box. So everything worked out just fine.

Well, that is, until Day 3, wherein I was relaxing, reading through my stack of classic Incredible Hulk comics with a big frosty Larry Bird cup of milk when the phone rang. In the time it took to shoo the telemarketer out of my life, Trent decided he was thirsty and leaned up for a sip of milk. Splashdown.

Trent was still a kitten, so I merely opened the window, reared back like Randy Johnson aiming for Kenny Lofton's head, and prepared to fastball the tabby into a nearby pond. Trent, oblivious to his impending watery doom, started purring, and thusly stayed quite dry — unlike my comics.

I found Trent a new home with other cats and was somewhat relieved. I don't think it's legal for a cat to live in the conditions I do. And I rarely feed myself, much less a hairy little monstrosity who likes gnawing on power cables and leaving smelly little packages in the most inconvenient of places.

So I visit animals, I don't take them home with me. It's good to take some time off and reconnect with nature in a purely neighborly sorta way. My father's farm is an excellent place to do just that — enough different species there to make Dr. Doolittle get hives. I can get accosted by an ostrich, bitten by a chinchilla, chased by a calf or harassed by a hedgehog.

Mind you, this is just a visit. Much as I enjoy frolicking with Frisky the ferret or scratching Wally the bunny behind the ears, my place is still a society filled with computers, machines and the occasional human being.

For me, critters equal chaos. Maybe you will understand this more if you've ever tried to catch a gerbil that is loose in your living room. And in my eyes, people still aren't that far removed from critters, so I'm looking to minimize my chaos quotient on the advice of my cardiologist. I had a Tamagotchi, but it ran away.

I know a lot of you have pets, and bully for you. I hope you treat them with care, respect and concern, much as you would your own children, or, if you let your kids break into relatives' houses, steal guns and snipe away at classmates, I hope you treat them a little better. Granted, most animals can't fire guns, but they make up for it with talons, fangs and quills. Just ask my dad about the peacock incident. Or better yet, don't.

Pets have personalities, believe you me. Any doubts I ever had about that were removed by Bob, my orange-and-white cat who lived to the age of 13 and was, without a doubt, chronically depressed. He would steal away from human contact whenever possible, sometimes uttering a pleading "mrowr" until cornered, at which point he went totally limp.

The cat's bones turned to tapioca as soon as he was held. With proper attention, he'd start purring, eventually, but he never became more than gelatinous. Still, he was a great cat and more in need of Prozac than any animal I've ever known.

Maybe it was the stigma of being named "Bob." Names are so important for a pet. Give me a critter and I'll give it a name with spark, flair, pizzazz. Actually, I might just name it Spark, Flair or Pizzazz, much like the longhaired kittens, who looked like photo negatives of each other, named Milkshake and Whitebread.

My relatives tend to name animals adventurously: horses named Star (spot on its head) or Paint are the common theme. Eventually they'll name a dog, well, "Dog" and, when they're not looking, I'll dye its hair bright yellow and paint a UPC symbol on its side. Generic pets, another miracle of modern life.

We've all seen the recent headlines of what happens in the most extreme circumstances of when animals are raised the wrong way. It's the less extreme cases I worry about. It's when you spend all day in class or at work and don't have time to give Bowser or Fluffy the attention they deserve. If I could, I'd make people get licenses before bearing children and, as a condition, make them own a pet for a year. It's a good test run.

The city is a human environment, and as such, animals are completely at human mercies inside its limits. If someone plucked you out of your apartment and dumped you in the middle of the Konza Prairie, wouldn't you want a band of polite ground squirrels to take care of you and not nip at you while you were trying to get some sleep?

Be kind to animals. Then stop off and have a burger.

People discriminate based on appearances

You, too, can be an opinion page columnist. All it takes is a lousy week.

After abdicating my throne last week, I looked forward to returning today with something lighthearted and laid-back, maybe even a bit cheesy. As I'd said at the beginning of the semester, most of my interests are relevant to everyone, not just black people. Besides, at this point in the semester, our educational clocks are ticking and any unnecessary stress could prove fatal. It was my hope that at this moment you'd be reading something that would slap a smile right across your face.

No such luck. It seems we'd much rather slap one another.

PAMELA MANNING

Pamela is a senior in mass communications. You can send e-mail to Pamela at pdm6732@ksu.edu

As usual, I'm up at the crack of 3 a.m. last Tuesday, reading the eCollegian. Imagine my delight when I read the Letters to the Editor and a particularly hip (read: piss-ass) opinion from Renee Hurla about my fellow columnist, Santos Ramirez. I do not know Ramirez, nor do I know what he or anyone else on this staff will write about before publication. But as much as I respect the right of free speech and people being able to have and to express their opinions fully, sometimes, as in Hurla's case, it would be nice if the opinions made sense.

Hurla said Ramirez "does nothing but whine about how badly he and other Latinos are treated." My reply to that, as an African-American woman, would be "So what?"

The greatest thing about the Collegian this semester has been our opinion editor's quest for diversity on staff. I believe Ramirez was speaking from his point of view about his experiences as a member of a particular culture. Whether or not you agree or disagree is entirely up to you.

Hurla also said biases and prejudices are "not the insurmountable obstacle" that Ramirez suggests. How the hell does she know that? Has she been refused job opportunities because of her ethnicity? Has she been shunned by in-crowds because of the color of her skin? I don't know anything about her life, so I wouldn't assume it's been perfect. I can assume, however, that she's probably never lacked anything for reasons relevant only to heritage.

Hurla later said Ramirez should "Buck up, and bear it." That's truly an insult to any group considered to be a minority, including females. If, God forbid, she were to ever find herself sexually harassed at some point in life, will she "Buck up, and bear it"?

Right about now, someone's thinking, "that's not the same thing." Just don't think it out loud. The person next to you would enjoy hearing your stupidity.

Finally, Hurla said there's no organization helping to fund the educations of non-minorities, and that there are no laws protecting white males. Sister, let this black woman ask you why those who caused these problems in the first place, more than 200 years ago, want or deserve the assistance and protection that they stripped from others? We chose to start organizations so that, as minorities, we can embrace our history and benefit from one other.

Someone else chose to start an organization for non-minorities. It's called the Ku Klux Klan

Today's whiners are tomorrow's bosses. Your boss.

Which brings me to Wednesday. Someone must have heard Hurla's prayers, because that morning, all the talk in the news was about the U.S. Appeals Court rejecting the Federal Communications Commission's affirmative action regulations for radio and TV broadcasters. What this essentially means is that there's pretty much no mandatory rule for cultural diversity in broadcasting, which FCC Chairman Bill Kennard calls "our nation's most influential medium."

Kennard said in a press release that the FCC's rules for affirmative action "have opened doors for minorities and women and have led to more minorities and women in front of and behind the television camera and inside and outside of the radio booth."

He's a black man. He must be whining. As chairman, I hope he bucks up and bears it.

Up to this point I've been lucky in this medium. I've gotten by as a quota, but also because of some talent (how much depends on whom you ask). But with this form of deregulation, how can we be sure people will give qualified women and minorities opportunities? Just suppose that I apply for a broadcasting job in the Deep South, and that I'm more qualified than the white male who also wants the job. Can you honestly tell me I'll get that job?

I don't think so. The number of average white males displaced to make room for women and minorities is less than nothing compared with the number of women and minorities who've been crapped on in the workplace for as long as there have been crappers.

Lest you believe I speak out only on issues that affect black people or Hispanic people, I'm down with the white people, too.

Did you happen to catch Cathy Bach's column on Thursday? She wrote about being verbally insulted because her appearance doesn't measure up to what some insensitive bastards believe it should. Again, I wonder why one person's life, appearance or orientation is the business of anybody else. There are people in this world who just look for trouble. Just give the high-five to anyone striving for self-betterment.

In 50 years, will you still care about the color of someone's skin (yes), how big their breasts are (hell, yes), and whether or not they have sex with someone of the same gender (you betcha)? Then you probably won't be visiting me, my boyfriend and our other woman in San Francisco anytime soon. Oops, there I go whining again.

Fundamentalism similar to fascism

Editor,

The Encarta Encyclopedia, 1997, defines fascism as: [A] 20th-century form of totalitarian dictatorship that sought to create a viable society by strict regimentation of national and individual lives; conflicting interests would be adjusted by total subordination to the service of the state and unquestioning loyalty to its leader.

A more accurate description of modern fundamentalist Protestantism would be hard to find. Fundamentalism seeks to regulate not only the lives of its adherents, but also the lives of all who its adherents might conceivably come in contact with.

It is a belief that every word in the Christian Bible, both Old and New Testaments, is literally true and the word of their God. Fundamentalism is growing in America, along with its political agenda. This includes a plan to get tax money for the religious indoctrination of children and agendas that include racism and religious persecution.

Racism? Religious persecution? Some would say that this doesn't sound like those who worship the one who said "Love thy neighbor as you love thyself." However, because of their doctrine of literally interpreting every passage as truth, that is precisely what results.

In addition to its intolerant policies, Christian Fundamentalism also seeks forcibly to indoctrinate others into its way of thinking. In addition to the use of tax monies to fund religious institutions, Fundamentalist convictions also have led one Circuit Court Judge in Florida to forbid one woman from raising her daughter in her own religion (Judge: Keep Girl from Witchcraft, Orlando Sentinel, Sept. 14, 1994), clearly violating her First Amendment rights.

Fundamentalism is a modern-day fascism, holding a mockery of the God of other Christians up as a cover for their bigotry and hatred. Its blind assertion that one book is the literal and only truth leads it to violate the rights of others and spurs it along a road that ends in the persecution of all others.

Fan wants loyalty put before money

Editor,

I am pleased to see the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics finally coming out with its comments on the Plan 2000, although I feel it is too little, too late.

I have been a season ticket holder for 15 years and have moved up to where I really enjoy the seats I have. I feel that fan loyalty is something our athletic department seems to have forgotten. It is fantastic seeing K-State football rise to the top of the college football ranks.

But giving first-choice seating because of the flash of green is wrong. There were some very long Saturdays during the years of Moon and Parish, and a few of the Purple Pride fans still remember those days.

Yes, increasing ticket prices can be expected in the world of economic demand.

I would not have a problem with being asked if I want to continue to have my seat by paying more for the seat. Stadium expansion, quality facilities and quality athletics and academics are all important, but a seat should not go to just the highest bidder.

Give people a choice of keeping their seats. We have earned it. Give us the freedom to choose whether we want to pay for tickets.

Don't sell us out, Max! Go Cats!

Panhellenic president takes office, plans to work for more involvement

COLLEGIAN STAFF

Lindsey Roy was the first woman in 10 years from her small hometown of Clyde, Kan., to join a sorority.

Roy not only decided to become a member of Alpha Chi Omega, but also ran for a Panhellenic Council office, which eventually put her in next year's presidential seat of the council.

Last year, Roy looked for a new, all-campus leadership activity and found the greek governing board interesting, she said.

"Panhellenic kind of popped up at that time, and I talked to another girl in my house who was director of public relations at that time," said Roy, junior in advertising and current director of public relations for Panhellenic Council. "We talked a lot about it, and it sounded like something I wanted to do."

Roy said she enjoys public speaking and meeting new people, but she has to remind herself of the large responsibilities associated with her current office of public relations and her new presidential office for next year.

"I really enjoyed this year," Roy said. "I think one of the things that is important is continuity. Our president this year was the only member who had been on the executive council last year."

Roy said the current president, Jennifer Gorman, junior in biology, helped the council members know what to do in office and how to expand ideas as a governing board.

"I was the only person interested in running for president and wasn't graduating, so it's all something that I wanted to do," Roy said. "It fit together for me to apply for president, so maybe I could give the continuity aspect to all the new officers."

Roy turned in an application and went through an interviewing process with the current Panhellenic executives. Past officers who applied for an office again were not allowed to participate in the interviewing process.

"Lindsey is really motivated," Gorman said.

"She goes above and beyond her job description."

Gorman, also a member of Alpha Chi Omega, said a good president is open to suggestions from everyone and a greek supporter in all aspects.

"They take the application in conjunction with your interview and slate two people for every office," Roy said. "But no one else ran for president."

Barb Robel, adviser for Greek Affairs, said there was a chance for the council to elect other members to the office of Panhellenic president.

"There can be write-ins from the floor, but it's not very common," Robel said. "But, it has happened before."

> president of > Interfraternity Council

Roy said she thought a good president was open-minded and willing to listen to other ideas from chapter representatives.

"Our role as a council is to take what the chapters want, implement it and be the organizing body," Roy said. "Being able to talk to a lot of different people, since there is all that representation, you need to be able to make sure that everyone feels like their opinion is being heard."

Roy said the president of each greek council also is responsible for handling any sort of conflicts, crises or emergency procedures.

"If someone is upset with something the council does, I think the president is kind of the person who takes the heat for it sometimes," she said.

Roy said her initial goal as president is to maintain the strong level of representation and image the Panhellenic Council has.

"But yet I'm also realistic and know there's a lot of problems," she said. "There is this image that can always be improved, and I don't even think it's so much as trying to tell people all about the good things we do, but maybe changing some of our processes, so the image naturally comes with it."

Roy said she would like to have a bigger award ceremony next spring, giving more chapter members the chance to get involved.

"I think recognition is a big thing, and not always recognizing the same people," she said.

Roy is recognized for her public relations work by Cade Keenan, junior in industrial engineering and director of public relations for the Interfraternity Council. Keenan, who recently was voted president of the 1998 Interfraternity Council, worked with Roy on all-greek public relations this year.

"We began working on NewsGreek, an IFC and Panhellenic newsletter," said Keenan, member of Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity. "From there, things just went really well. We seem to click together."

Keenan said working with Roy in public relations was good because she was willing to compromise when it came to making decisions.

"Working with her was great," Keenan said. "She was just chocked with ideas. She always had all these excellent ideas to improve on. I think that's one of her greatest assets."

SPORTS ROUNDUP

Sports Round-up is your daily dose of the latest scores, stats and news from the world of sports outside of K-State. Compiled from Associated Press reports.

Wildcat track team earns NCAA qualifying marks

The K-State track team put forth a number of good performances at two different meets over the weekend, including two NCAA qualifying marks in both the men's high jump and women's hammer.

High jumpers Nathan Leeper and Charles Burney placed third and fourth respectively at the Mount San Antonio College Relays Invitational Division on Sunday.

Both Leeper and Burney had leaps of 7-4 1/2, which is an NCAA automatic qualifying mark.

Also at the Mount SAC Relays, Renetta Seiler suffered her first defeat of the season in the hammer throw. Her NCAA automatic-qualifying throw of 200-5 placed third in the Invitational Division.

Competing in the Mount SAC University Division hammer throw, Anna Whitham brought home the gold medal with a NCAA provisional-qualifying throw of 180 feet.

Wildcat middle distance runners Istvan Nagy and Scott Galas placed fifth and sixth respectively in the University Division 800-meters at Mount SAC. Nagy finished in 1:50.12 while Galas finished in 1:51.95.

In the Arkansas Tyson Invitational at Fayetteville, Ark., the K-State men placed several throwers in the top three of their respective events.

Wildcat thrower Gene Petersen won the Wildcats' only gold medal of the meet with a toss of 179-1 in the hammer.

Scott Petersen took second place in the hammer with a throw of 175-11.

T.J. Turner, an all-America javelin thrower in 1995, placed second with a throw of 198-4.

In the shot put, Tamel Sisney finished in third place with a throw of 52-6 1/2.

The women's team was led by Darcy Morris, who placed third in the 400-meter dash with a time of 55.12.

Los Angeles Clippers fire Coach Bill Fitch on Monday

LOS ANGELES — Coach Bill Fitch was fired by the Los Angeles Clippers on Monday, two days after the perennial NBA doormat finished a 17-65 season.

Clippers vice president of basketball operations Elgin Baylor said he planned to compile a list of candidates for the coaching job within a few days.

Fitch, 63, coached the Clippers for four years, compiling a 99-229 record in Los Angeles, including 36-46 and a playoff berth last season.

Hit hard by injuries this season, including the loss of floor leader Loy Vaught, the Clippers' record was the third-worst in the NBA, behind only Denver, which won 11 games and fired its coach Monday, and Toronto, which won 16 games and saw its coach resign in February.

Fitch is the only man to coasch more than 2,000 games.

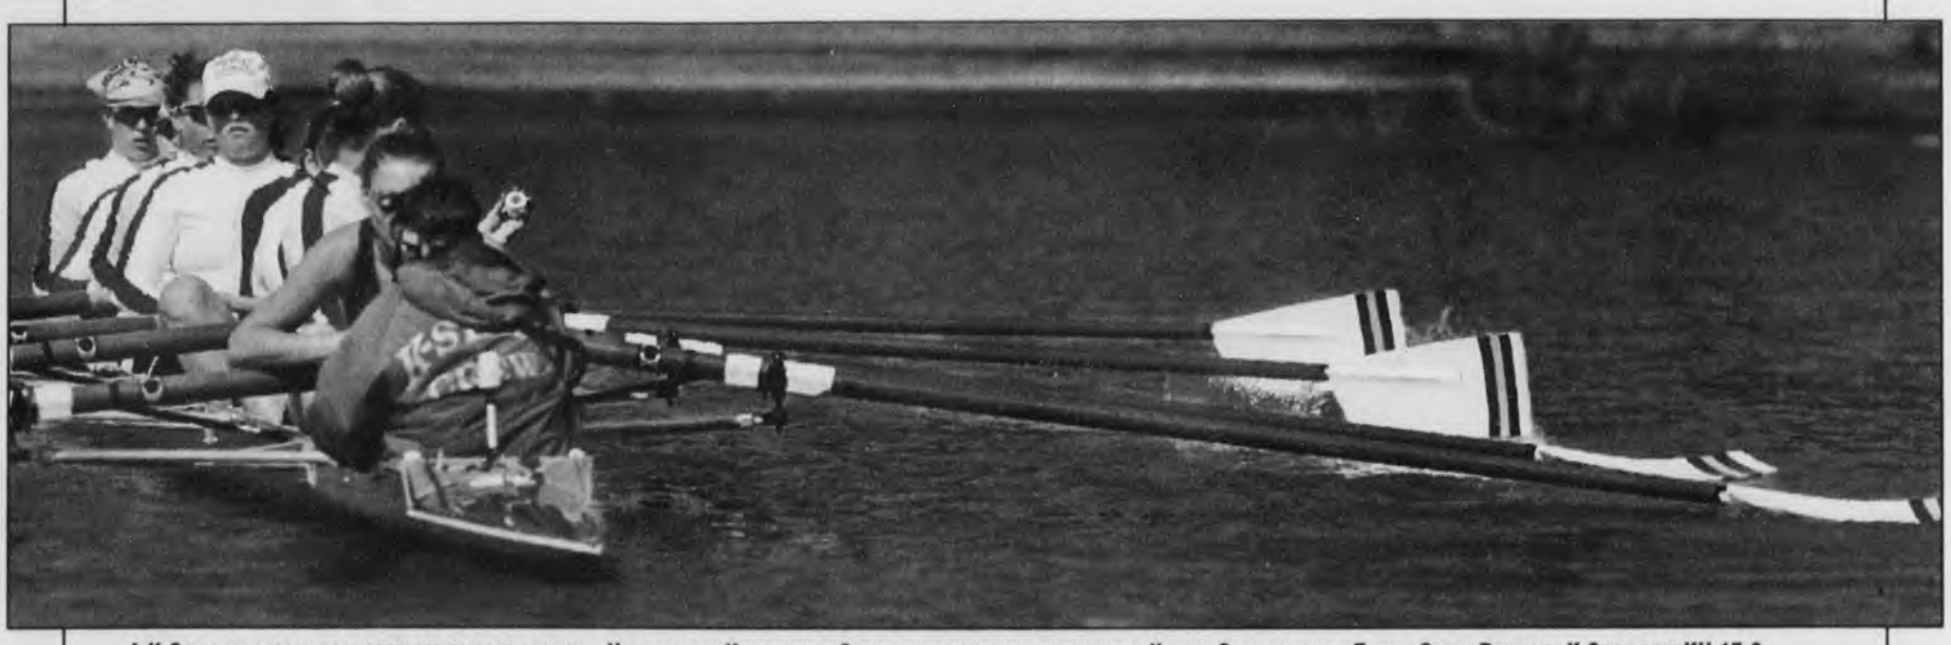
Denver Nuggets fire coach after disastrous 1st season

DENVER — Bill Hanzlik's first season as coach of the Denver Nuggets was one of the worst in NBA history. There won't be a second.

The Nuggets fired Hanzlik on Monday, one day after completing an 11-71 season, leaving the team rebuilding again and looking for its eighth coach this decade.

For almost the entire season, the Nuggets were a threat to surpass the league's worst record ever — 9-73 by the 1972-73 Philadelphia 76ers.

They managed to avoid that dubious record by two games, and they did it with rookies and journeymen.



Hanzlik, 40, who has two years remaining on the contract he signed before the season, won't be around for the next effort at rebuilding, after being dismissed along with assistants T.R. Dunn and Brian Winters.

"The Nuggets franchise must move forward and put this disappointing season behind," vice president and general manager Dan Issel said. "We will continue to evaluate every level of the organization and focus on returning the Nuggets to respectability in the NBA."

Issel's hiring, on March 25, seemed to seal Hanzlik's fate.

Issel replaced Allan Bristow, who had hired Hanzlik, his good friend, but then became the first victim of the horrible season as he was fired in February.

"Bill Hanzlik is a good man," Issel said. "Bill Hanzlik was basically thrown into a no-win situation. Is it fair? Probably not."

K-State battles Kansas, defeats Hawks 17-9 in inaugural Kansas Cup regatta

STORY BY JENNIFER JANSONIUS • PHOTO BY CLIF PALMBERG

K-State battled Kansas for the win, 17-9, in the inaugural Kansas Cup regatta on Saturday at Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

K-State went head to head with KU for eight races and grabbed wins in three of the first four races. K-State lost to Kansas in the novice four, but took wins in the second varsity four, varsity four and novice eight.

"Our team has come a long way, especially in the past two weeks. The spring walk-ons are performing very well and contributing to the success of the team," novice coach Ellen Minzner said.

Emily Berenson rowed in the novice eight that lengthened K-State's lead to 9-1.

"We pulled away in the first 500 meters, and we kept the lead," Berenson said.

She said keys to the Wildcats' win were keeping the boat focused and maintaining rhythm in the race. K-State lost the second novice eight and the second varsity eight to tie the score at 9-9 go into the final race of the regatta.

"We raced varsity fours as priority boats, and then both teams prioritized their eights at the end of the afternoon," K-State coach Jenny Hale said.

Hale said the women heard the score was tied just before the final race began.

"I think it was a good thing they heard before they raced. There is nothing like a little pressure to make it fun," Hale said.

Hale said K-State had beaten KU all season long except for last weekend. Heather Brunk, fifth seat in the varsity eight, said everyone had prepared a lot the previous week and worked hard on focusing.

"We had lost to KU the week before, and when we heard the race was tied, I think everyone got that little extra spark."

That spark proved the varsity eight victorious, by a narrow margin of 6:38.24 to 6:42.21, to capture the Kansas Cup.

K-State received the Kansas Cup, a traveling trophy designed by the coaches to commemorate the rivalry.

"The cup is a nice incentive for the future," Minzner said, "and it makes a more concrete goal to go for the cup."

The trophy was presented by Ruth Ann Wefald, wife of K-State President Jon Wefald.

"We had excellent weather and good day racing," Hale said.

Hale said most of the boats had good starts that gave them the edge, but they needed to work on the body of the race and sprints.

"I think Kansas raced the best they ever had against us. They proved to be very strong across the boards, and it was good for us to be pushed and respond," she said.

This weekend is the Cats' next regatta at the Midwest Championships.

"This is going to be a very big competition," Hale said. "This weekend is one of two upcoming races that are looked upon heavily for seating at the NCAA Championships."

Lacrosse club wins 15-3

DAN MERKER
Kansas State Collegian

Even before the game, a bad omen existed for the Rockhurst Lacrosse Club. It's pretty hard to win a game when a team doesn't have enough players to field a complete squad.

Rockhurst showed up one player short and had to borrow several from K-State. The visiting squad's uniforms consisted of blue and purple jerseys.

Because of these factors, among others, K-State dominated Rockhurst virtually the entire game and cruised to a 15-3 win Saturday at Memorial Stadium. The Wildcats improved to 2-1 for the season.

The game was the last at home for three K-State seniors: Brian Frownfelter, Chris Torline and John Culbertson. Each player managed to score at least one goal in the finale.

Frownfelter had three goals and an assist before getting knocked out of the game when he took a stick to the chin in the fourth quarter.

"It felt great to score in my last home game," Frownfelter said. "There's nothing like playing in Memorial Stadium."

The game started out ominously for K-State. Rockhurst drew a slashing penalty and capitalized with the extra man to take an early 1-0 lead. K-State came back and was on offense for most of the game. The Cats scored the final four goals of the first quarter, including one at the buzzer, to take a 4-1 lead.

Then the Mark Austin show began. Austin, a K-State midfielder, played at perennial NCAA-power Towson State for four years, earning honorable mention All-America honors his senior season. He also played professionally for a few years with the Philadelphia Wings in the Major Indoor Lacrosse League.

Austin moved to Manhattan and wanted to continue playing lacrosse, so he joined up with the K-State squad. His experience and talent showed throughout the game and has helped his teammates.

"They've come a long way real fast," Austin said. "They've made some serious improvement. Somebody like me who's played for years can help."

After assisting on two of the first-quarter goals, Austin scored all five of K-State's goals in the second quarter, leading the Cats to a 9-2 lead at halftime. In all, Austin had eight goals and two assists for the game.

The Cats outscored Rockhurst 6-1 in the second half to coast to victory.

The Cats play Kansas on Saturday in their regular season finale before the Great Plains Lacrosse League Final Four on May 2.

Community college forward signs letter of intent with K-State team

K-STATE SPORTS INFORMATION

Tony Kitt, a 6-foot-5-inch, 225-pound forward from Charlotte, N.C., has signed a letter of intent with K-State, Wildcat head coach Tom Asbury announced Monday.

Kitt, who played at Colby Community College last season, was unanimous first-team All-District VI, All-Jayhawk and All West last season for Colby. He averaged 20.8 points, 10.2 rebounds, 2.3 blocks and shot 57 percent from the field.

"Tony is a fabulous prospect for Kansas State," Bill Morse, Colby head coach, said. "I think he can compete at the Big 12 level. We are pleased he stayed in state so we will get a chance to see him."

Morse said Kitt contributed mainly on the inside for Colby but has the ability to step out on the perimeter at K-State.

"He has strength inside," Morse said. "In order to play at the next two levels, he will have to improve outside. He has great potential there. He is a good penetrator, can handle the ball and can drive and hit the open player on the outside for the three. He is well-suited for the team-style motion offense. He has all the tools to play at the next level."

ASBURY

Asbury said he looks for Kitt to step into the Wildcat front line and contribute immediately.

"We are excited to have Tony join our program," Asbury said. "He is an exceptional athlete who should make a significant impact on our front line."

Kitt is the third addition to the Wildcat roster this spring. He joins community college transfer Cortez Groves and local high school star Travis Reynolds.

Amateurs' softball team focuses on winning games, having fun

You know it's going to be a perfect day when Chuck Fehr predicts it. Trust me. Fehr, a bartender at Scoreboard in Manhattan, just knows these things.

He predicts good nights, too. He'll tell you at 8 p.m. whether Scoreboard will be packed by 10:30 p.m. He enjoys a good draft beer and owns more bar stools than Norm on "Cheers." When 10:30 p.m. rolls around and Scoreboard's patrons are shoulder-to-shoulder, Fehr stands behind the bar and smiles with a wink while grabbing customers' money.

It's a good night.

So nobody so much as batted an eye at Fehr's comment Sunday afternoon, which came 20 minutes before Scoreboard was to make the Killer Bees team extinct and turn the Dog Pound team into a litter of Pound Puppies in an intramural softball doubleheader at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

"This is the perfect day for a butt-whipping," Fehr said while he stretched out in the grass by Field 6 with teammate Brendan Haugh. The two players were watching the final inning of another softball game.

"Yeah. It's 73 degrees with a slight wind," Haugh said. "It's a perfect day."

Scoreboard was perfect Sunday.

After its 17-2 and 26-0 doubleheader wins, Scoreboard sits at a perfect 3-0, ranked No. 2 behind Fromunducheez in the men's intramural softball standings. Scoreboard has outscored its opponents 60-3. All three opponent runs were unearned. Scoreboard can't even play for an entire game. Hey, come on, ump. It's softball. Let the guys play. Surely there's a team out there that can recover from a 26-0, fourth-inning deficit, right? Wrong. The umpire ended both of Sunday's contests early because Scoreboard was ahead by 15 runs after four innings of play.

Instead of telling the tale by score, it became more interesting grading the games like tennis matches. Scoreboard discarded Killer Bees in 34 minutes. Dog Pound lasted 44 minutes.

Left-center fielder Brendan "One-Hop Kimball" Haugh has the perfect swing and maintains perfect hair even after running all those bases. Somewhere, Sam Malone is jealous. Haugh hits hard. Really hard.

Legend has it, during Scoreboard's loss to Fromunducheez in the 1997 men's independent championship game, Haugh, batting on Field 2, hit a ball that, after one bounce, tagged the chain-link fence on the edge of Kimball Avenue, nearly 380 feet away.

Scoreboard has been nearly perfect in four seasons of intramural softball. The only blemish to its 1997 season was the men's independent championship game, and players reasoned it was because (are you ready for this?) unlike most ball parks, many of the recreation center's eight baseball diamonds don't have fences to distinguish home-run territory.

K-State Sports Information director and Scoreboard team member Kent Brown remembered his hit in the championship game that traveled close to 320 feet.

Had there been a fence, he said, it probably would have been a home run.

"We had a couple like that during the game," Brown said, shaking his head.

Each season, Scoreboard co-owner Rhett Butler composes a lineup of hard-hitting, burly guys who send outfielders to other ZIP codes to retrieve balls. There are hitting legends such as former Scoreboard player David Amaro, who during a game last year stood at home plate on Field 6 and socked a rocket into a volleyball pit about 390 feet away.

With each game comes heroic or humorous stories, ones that players sit and talk about forever over beer inside Scoreboard. Amaro's tale still comes up. This year, Scoreboard players' biggest opponents have been themselves. In this case, that's not bad. They're having fun.

Scoreboard's softball players' handbook, page 36: "Tell a joke. Go to bat. Hit a home run. Run bases. Walk into dugout. Give and receive wise-cracks. Repeat process."

These guys are allowed to have fun. However, in addition to the chuckles and name-calling, there lies an inner hunger in Scoreboard players who plan on a showdown with Fromunducheez late in the playoffs.

"No one will touch us until the playoffs," Butler said.

For now, these games are practice. Payback begins in the playoffs. We take you now to the top of the fourth inning against Dog Pound on Sunday evening, where Scoreboard is ahead 5-0, but needs 10 more runs to secure a 15-run lead to end the game.

"Let's get 15 this inning," Brown said.

Scoreboard proceeded to score 21 in the fourth inning and hit nine home runs, including a towering shot by Fehr that sailed past bewildered outfielders.

Fehr circled the bases, put his hands on his knees and said with a grin, "Who said alcohol doesn't breed athletes?"

The perfect night, indeed.

GRACEFUL MOVES

K-STATE STUDENTS MELANIE FURJANIC AND TRACY DAVIS PERFORM WITH BRYAN CUNNINGHAM, RIGHT, DANCER FROM THE STATE BALLET OF MISSOURI, AT THE FOLLY THEATER IN KANSAS CITY, MO., SUNDAY. THE PERFORMANCE WAS PART OF A BENEFIT FOR THE K-STATE DANCE PROGRAM.

Kansas City benefit features K-State dancers

A dance performance is ethereal, fleeting. As soon as the dancer takes the final bow, the moment is gone except in the memories of the audience members. If the performance is a good one, certain moments become like mental snapshots, where technique, artistic style and music all come together in perfect synchronicity.

Sunday afternoon's joint performance by the K-State dance program and the State Ballet of Missouri offered many of these moments.

One came during "Alegria," a modern piece choreographed by Diana Yamabayashi, senior in dance and theater. As an exuberant chorus of voices was raised to a crescendo, six dancers in perfect unison twirled in a tight formation, their layered peasant dresses reflecting the warm, red, stage lights. This dance beautifully juxtaposed differing elements. Quick, stunted movements blended into more fluid ones. Sometimes each dancer was doing a different step, and sometimes they came together to move as one unit.

Another moment that shined Sunday, this one an instant of perfect alignment, came during "Pas de Trois," (dance of three) choreographed by Joyce Yagerline, assistant professor of dance.

Students Melanie Furjanic and Tracy Davis, K-State dancers, stood at opposite ends of the stage, their backs to the audience and arms extended in parallel 45-degree angles. State Ballet dancer Bryan Cunningham stood at center stage and took the same position with his arms. He then made the picture complete as he slowly extended his leg and then, for a brief moment, held it at the exact same angle. This piece, the only one to incorporate dancers from both K-State and Missouri, ended much too quickly.

The pas de deux (dance of two) from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" was performed by Sean Duus and Kim Cowen of the Missouri ballet. A little tension usually is felt in the audience during a pas de deux; with so many lifts, spins and leaps, the partners have to be in perfect synch to pull it off. And that is precisely what happened when Duus lifted Cowen and then, while he lowered her slowly to the floor, she raised her leg and both arms in an exquisite arabesque and lightly touched down on a perfectly arched pointe.

William Whitener, artistic director of the State Ballet of Missouri, said the dance was from the nocturne section of "A Midsummer Night's Dream." The piece had a definite nighttime feel as the dancers were bathed in soft, silvery-blue light.

At one point in "Tongue-Tied," a jazzy piece choreographed by instructor Jo Byrnes Miller, seven women took turns leaping across the stage. Each jump was like an explosion of energy, and one dancer in particular seemed to defy the boundaries of her physical self as she kicked her legs apart while arching over backwards.

The performance, which was at the Folly Theater in Kansas City, Mo., only lasted an hour, but this quick peek at the K-State dance program gave the audience a wealth of memories to take home.

Construction begins in May for new Nichols Hall studios

The process to move the K-State dance program to Nichols Hall has moved a few steps closer to completion.

At Sunday's gala in Kansas City, Mo., David Procter, associate professor in the Department of Speech Communication, Theater and Dance, said fund raising had procured $80,000 of the $120,000 needed for the move.

"We are well over half in terms of our fund raising. We feel very good about that," Procter said.

His announcement at the downtown Marriott Hotel came immediately after Amy Verdon, junior in theater, entertained the crowd of supporters and donors with the song "Hey, Big Spender." The fund-raiser included a brunch, participation awards and a joint performance by K-State dance students and the State Ballet of Missouri.

Procter said the bids given for the construction of four new studios and three new offices in Nichols were within the department's proposed budget, and groundbreaking was scheduled to begin May 15.

Roni Mahler, who started the dance program in fall 1974, explained the history of dance education at K-State. She said she co-wrote the program that became the dance major, under the Department of Health, Physical Education, Recreation and Dance.

As she talked about the dance program's eventual alignment with the speech and theater programs and the move from Ahearn Field House to Nichols, Mahler wiped tears from her eyes.

"We've come a long way, baby," she said.

Mahler presented four people with the 1998 Roni Mahler Award for their support of the dance program.

One of the recipients, Ruth Ann Wefald, said she was appreciative of all the people who had given their time and money to support dance at K-State.

"It's wonderful to be a dreamer, like myself, but it's necessary to have people who can make it happen," she said.

Edna Johnson, who graduated from K-State in 1928, said she attended the fund-raiser because her daughter, dance instructor Randi Dale, invited her.

Dale said she became interested in teaching dance partly because, as a child, she always was encouraged to dance by her mother.

"We used to dance around the living room all the time," she said.

Iron City band releases 7-song EP with solid mix of ska, blues, attitude

PHIL KELLUM
Kansas State Collegian

The fine city of Pittsburgh, Pa., has done it again. The iron city has produced another wonderful band, and this time it's the B-3s.

The B-3s is a ska band that plays a bluesy mixture of traditional and 2-Tone styled ska, with a dash of punk attitude but not punk sound.

Formed in 1996 out of the ashes of Pittsburgh punk legends The Bad Genes and Necracedia, as well as Skablins and Wimp Factor 14, the band has been wowing audiences in the western Pennsylvania area, as well as New York City and Washington, D.C., since then.

Hot on the heels of the B-3s' appearances on two nationally released compilations and a two-song 7-inch, Jump Start Records, from State College, Pa., finally has unleashed a seven-song compact disc EP titled "Devil's Bluebeat."
